'All-out war' against Hamas: Barak

By SHAHAR ILAN
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspapers Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Facing catcalls from Arab lawmakers, Defence Minister Ehud Barak told a stormy Knesset session on Dec. 29 that the operation in Gaza will be "widened and deepened as is necessary.

"We have an 'all-out war' against Hamas and its kind," Barak said, using a term he has employed in the past to describe the long-term struggle against Israel's Islamist enemies.

Barak's address came as the Israel Defence Forces continued a third day of air assaults on the Gaza Strip, killing more than 300 Palestinians in the deadliest violence in the territory in decades.

He recalled that U.S. president-elect Barack Obama, who visited Sderot during his election campaign last year, said that "if rockets were being fired at his home while his two daughters were sleeping, he would do everything he could to prevent it."

The defence minister said that Israel is engaged in a "war to the bitter end" against Hamas in Gaza.

Barak added that the massive air assault Israel launched on Dec. 27 is aimed not at Gaza's residents but at the territory's Hamas rulers. He said the operation's goal is to force Hamas to stop its hostile actions directed at Israeli civilians.

Economic downturn causing 'anxiety, concern'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Heads of Jewish organizations are saying that it's still too early to know how they will be affected by Canada's economic downturn in the last few months of 2008.

However, community leaders say they are learning of more and more individuals who are being affected by the economy, and they are preparing for the fallout.

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, senior rabbi of Beth Tzedec Congregation, has noted "a lot of anxiety and concern," particularly among retirees and those nearing retirement.

As well, he said, "a number of young people have lost their jobs."

The synagogue's executive director, Sheldon Maerov, noted that the downturn "really hit" in October after most people had renewed their annual memberships, and any income loss affecting their ability to pay is not necessarily apparent yet.

Fundraising is also an area that will pose increasing challenges, Maerov expects. He anticipates that donors to all causes may spread large gifts over a longer time span or reduce the amounts of their pledges.

However, he added, there may also be donors who come forward for the first time, because they realize the necessity of doing so.

The News in Brief

CANADA

PM Lights Menorah

CALGARY — Prime Minister Stephen Harper took part in a menorah-lighting ceremony at Calgary city hall on Dec. 22 as part of Chabad Lubavitch of Alberta's 20th anniversary celebrations. The PM used the opportunity to herald the Conservative party's support for Israel and its dedication to fighting anti-Semitism. "Under my government, our country will remain a resolute defender of the Jewish faith, of Jewish religious freedom and our country will remain a staunch ally of the State of Israel," he told the crowd and Canadian Press.

Eilat Emerg

TORONTO — UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, in cooperation with United Israel Appeal of Canada, is contributing $1 million toward a $4-million renovation of Eilat's Yoseftal Hospital. The project includes a new emergency room for the hospital, which is the sole provider of medical services to the 55,000 residents of Eilat and 11 surrounding communities, as well as visitors to the area. Clalit Health Services contributed $2 million to the project and the Israeli government added another $1 million.

WORLD

iPhone Siddur

NEW YORK — A new digital prayer book has been made available for Apple's popular iPhone. The siddur, created by the Internet company RustyBrick, offers prayer texts in several versions, as well as a feature to determine appropriate prayer times based on location. A built-in data base helps users locate the nearest minyan. It can be downloaded through the iTunes application.

Rare Rimonim

SYDNEY, Australia — A pair of rare silver Torah crowns have been purchased by an unnamed U.S. buyer, amid a dispute in Australia over the sale of valuable Judaica. The rimonim, which date back to 1719 and which Sothebys described in its catalogue as "exceptionally rare," were sold by the auction house in New York for $338,500 (US). The items were found by accident in a store room of the Great Synagogue in Sydney. Norman Seligman, CEO of the Sydney Jewish Museum, said that it was "a pity that something that has some significance to the Australian Jewish community is sold and leaves the country."

Citizen of Paris

PARIS — Captive Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit was recently named an honorary citizen of Paris. The title was bestowed on Schalit, a French-Israeli dual citizen, in a unanimous vote of Paris city council. The French town of Raincy also named Schalit an honorary citizen in November, while the Grenoble City Hall hung his photo in their building facade in December. Schalit has been held by Hamas in Gaza since 2006.

Citizen of Rome?

ROME — Rome's mayor favours granting honorary citizenship to the eternal city to captured Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit. During a public menorah-lighting ceremony, Mayor Gianni Alemanno said the proposal, put forward by Rome's Jewish community, seemed like "an excellent idea." Alemanno added that he wanted to extend the honour "to give a sign of solidarity to the Jewish community."

Madoff Fallout

ATHENS — Avriani, a leading Greek newspaper, called Bernard Madoff's Ponzi scheme "the Jewish Connection." Under a front page headline, the weekly devoted five pages of its Dec. 21 edition to the Madoff scandal, emphasizing at least six times that Madoff is Jewish and implying that Jews are behind the world's financial problems.

Bnei Menashe Get Chanukah Books

JERUSALEM — A book about Chanukah laws and customs has been distributed to the Bnei Menashe of northeastern India in their native languages of Mizo and Kuki.

The Bnei Menashe, who were exiled from Israel some 500 years before the historical events commemorated in Chanukah and who reside primarily in the Indian states of Mizoram and Manipur, were unaware of the holiday until the modern era.

The Bnei Menashe claim descent from one of the Ten Lost Tribes of Israel, which were sent into exile by the Assyrian Empire more than 27 centuries ago.

Shavei Israel, a non-profit organization designed to strengthen ties between Israel and the descendants of Jews around the world, printed and distributed the book.

"The Bnei Menashe are anxiously awaiting the passage of a decision by Israel's cabinet to allow them all to come to Israel," said Michael Freund, Shavei Israel's chair and founder.

People with mental health issues need more resources

Part 1 of this three-part series, which appeared in the Dec. 18 issue of CJN, examined the stigma associated with people who suffer from mental illness and the lack of attention given to this problem in the Toronto Jewish community.

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Special Report
Part 2 of 3

There aren't enough homes or services available for the mentally ill in the Jewish community, compared to the number of people who need help, said "John," who has a brother with schizophrenia.

"I don't think anyone even has an idea of the number of mentally ill in the community because it is just not a priority," he said.

Rochelle Goldman-Brown is the executive director of Chai Tikvah Foundation, a Jewish support service that provides housing for psychiatrically disabled adults, as well as support services for people living on their own.

"We've been around for 25 years. We have a group home, a triplex, and we run a social recreational program once a week out of the National Council of Jewish Women," Goldman-Brown said.

"But we're basically a band-aid for the need of the community."

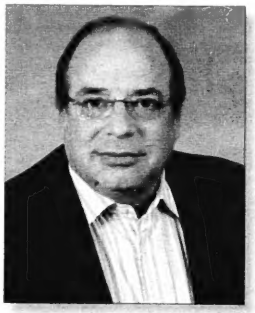
She explained that the group home located in Thornhill, Ont., has eight residents who receive 24-hour support.

Last year, the foundation purchased a triplex, which has space to house eight more residents who receive support from a staff of about 15 social workers who make frequent visits to the home.

Chai Tikvah, which works to have its residents eventually move into more independent living, has also been allotted 15 apartments in a new complex being built at the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in Vaughan, which will provide housing for 18 adults who require less supervision.

The weekly social recreation program for residents and others in the community is called Club Simcha. Funded by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, the program attracts 20 to 25 people each week.

But John, whose Holocaust survivor parents have been taking care of his schizophrenic adult brother for his entire life, spoke to The CJN on the condition of anonymity about the lack of services for the Jewish community.



Richard Cummings

"If we look at the numbers of the people who are mentally ill – and that is a broad term that can include people who are depressed – the numbers are just totally out of whack. There aren't only 12 mentally ill people in the Toronto Jewish community that need services," he said, referring to the small number of people Chai Tikvah is able to support.

"So, either they are living on the streets or are abandoned, living in shelters; or parents like mine are suffering and dealing with the consequences," John said, adding that his family is considering Toronto's Baycrest Centre to provide his brother with long-term care, but the waiting list is years long.

As a result of the lack of space in Jewish housing, Goldman-Brown said that many Jews are living in non-Jewish group homes.

"We get a lot of calls from those people saying, 'They have crosses here,' or 'They don't have kosher food,' and it's a struggle," she said.

Filial love, beauteous, inspiring

From the editor's desk...

In November, as reported in The CJN and in other media, Rabbi Gunther Plaut donated his extensive personal library of more than 4,000 books to the Clara Thomas Archives and Special Collections at York University in Toronto.

Accompanying the story of the very generous donation that appeared in this paper was a photo of Rabbi Plaut, smiling, his tie a bit askew, seated between his two children, Judith Plaut and Rabbi Jonathan Plaut, who were standing on either side of him.

Evident in the photo are signs of the Alzheimer's that struck Rabbi Plaut some five years ago. The formerly clear-eyed, sculpted, vigorous features of his face have ceded to the softer visage and the cloudy, somewhat opaque expression that we see on the victims of the disease.

The feeling of melancholy that accompanied the sight of the physical decline of one of Canadian Jewry's acknowledged giants was undeniable, though fleeting. But the occasion was a momentous one for the Plaut family and especially for the wider Canadian public that will be served by the scholarship that will ultimately flow from the housing of the Plaut library at York University.

The sheer scope of the library makes it a very significant addition to the world of higher learning and independent study. Not surprisingly given the vast, eclectic knowledge of the man, the books in the rabbi's collection range across a broad spectrum of works on religion, science, ethics, politics and history, as well as art, popular fiction and cartoons.

Sara Horowitz, director of York's Centre for Jewish Studies and a monthly columnist with The CJN, said of the library that "among other things, it includes rare books of Judaica, books of biblical commentary on Halachah, books by really important Jewish thinkers that are, the books themselves, several centuries old, and they are quite rare. These are books that you would very infrequently encounter," Horowitz said.

She also pointed out that the significance of the acquisition was additionally enhanced because York's Centre for Jewish Studies now will retain the copyright arising from the further publication of Rabbi Plaut's works.

"It means we can develop Jewish intellectual projects that might have Rabbi Plaut's writing at the centre. In the future, we might decide to take a particular essay or a sermon of his, or something he published on any given issue that might have wide-reaching implications, and we could use his essay as a jumping-off point," Horowitz said.

The profundity and breadth of Rabbi Plaut's writing could not be better illustrated than in the publication last year of Eight Decades, The Selected Writings of W. Gunther Plaut (Dundern Press).

Apart from one essay, the selections in the book were actually made by Rabbi Plaut himself more than 15 years ago. The folio containing the essays was discovered by the rabbi's son, Jonathan, while he sorted through his father's voluminous papers. When decisions were made about publishing the collection, Rabbi Jonathan Plaut added one essay to those selected by his father.

True to the characteristic for which Rabbi Plaut was known, the sweep of subject matter in this collection is very impressive. The essays deal with studies of history, biblical inquiries, literature and linguistics, theological questions, moral and social issues, Israel, Reform Jewish perspectives, the German-Jewish experience and legal issues. They will delight the earnest and curious reader.

As Rabbi Jonathan Plaut notes in his introduction to the book, it is intended as a companion to One Voice: The Selected Sermons of W. Gunther Plaut, (Dundern Press), which was published in 2007.

In the photo that appeared with the news story of the library donation to York University, Rabbi Plaut's children stand beside their infirm father, obviously proud and very much respectful of him.

Jonathan Plaut's right hand rests tenderly and undoubtedly, firmly as well, on his father's shoulder.

The photo is a moving portrait of filial love that is at once beautiful and inspiring. It is a gentle, powerful image that visibly reinforces the values that guide this family and that have guided the Jewish people for thousands of years: "Al tashlichenu l'eyt ziknah; Kichlot cochainu al ta'azvenu" (Please do not cast us aside in our old age. When our strength abates, please do not abandon us.) These prayers appear in the Rosh Hashanah/Yom Kippur liturgy.

With the concluding paragraph of his introduction, Rabbi Jonathan Plaut provides a further glimpse into the touching realm of the marked filial love that has very obviously characterized his and his sister's relation to their father.

"Until my father developed Alzheimer's disease five years ago, he spent each day writing his regular newspaper columns and magazine articles, or working on his current book. This anthology is the final publication from his pen – may its publication keep alive the spirit of this great man!"

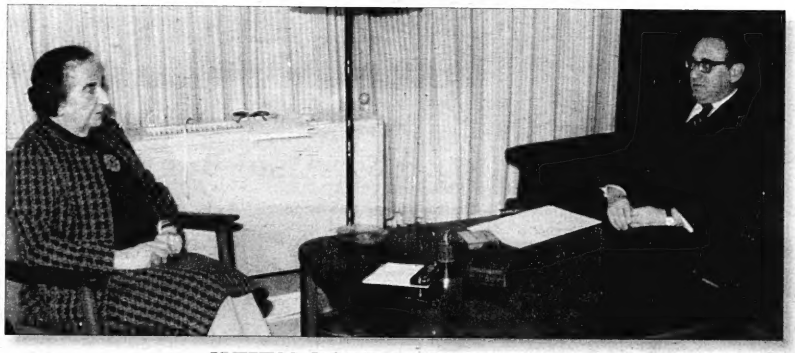
SeeJN CELEBRATING 60 YEARS OF ISRAEL



WHEN GOLDA MET HENRY

In January 1974, U.S. secretary of state Henry Kissinger launched what came to be known as shuttle diplomacy. His goal was to end hostilities between Israel and Egypt, and between Israel and Syria after the 1973 Yom Kippur War. Kissinger was successful. Eventually, Israel signed separation of forces agreements with both Egypt and Syria. In 1979, Israel and Egypt signed a peace treaty, but to this day, Israel and Syria remain technically at war. In this photo, Kissinger meets with Israeli prime minister Golda Meir, who resigned some months later.

Israeli offensive touches off protests in Canada

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF and SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporters

Protests and counter-protests took place in cities across Canada last weekend in reaction to Israel's attack on Gaza.

In the wake of the Israel Defence Forces' large-scale, weekened bombing campaign against Hamas forces, compounds and smuggling tunnels – in response to days of continuous rocket fire from Gaza after a ceasefire truce expired Dec. 19 – pro-Palestinian demonstrators in Canada staged marches on Sunday in Ottawa, Toronto, Montreal and other cities, denouncing Israel's operation.

Amir Gissin

In Toronto, hundreds of demonstrators turned out in front of the Israeli Embassy. Also present were several members of the Jewish Defence League.

Meir Weinstein, national director of the Jewish Defence League of Canada, said he managed to get about 40 people together in Toronto for Sunday's demonstration, after learning Saturday night that organizations including the Canadian Arab Federation, Coalition Against Israeli Apartheid, and Palestine House planned to protest outside the Israeli consulate.

"I found out about this Saturday night and did whatever I could to get some people together.

Weinstein said about 300 people gathered to protest against Israel's attack on Gaza. He said Sid Ryan, president of the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE) Ontario, was among them.

A Dec. 29 report in the Toronto Star quoted Ryan as saying at the Toronto protest: "I want to condemn, in the strongest terms, the acts of genocide committed by Israel this weekend."

Moshe Ronen

Weinstein said: "We heard some people saying in Arabic, 'Slaughter the Jews.' That was not said by the organizers, but it was said by quite a few of the protesters.

"We want to make sure that whenever there is going to be an anti-Israel protest, we're going to be there to counter it, to make sure that the reporting is going to be balanced and make sure that there are people from Canada's Jewish community that will stand up for the Israeli army and what they're doing."

Weinstein said he also heard pro-Palestinian organizers telling their supporters that what Israel was doing is "a genocide, and calling Israel an apartheid state. They don't believe there should be an Israel."

He said there were shouting matches between the two sides, but no violence.

"Israel is involved in a just war against Hamas, and it's about time," he said.

Every country has the right and obligation to protect its citizens, says Ronen

In Montreal, dozens of protesters marched down Ste-Catherine Street, some bearing banners reading "Save Gaza," "Free Palestine" and "Break the Siege," among others, according to a Dec. 29, report from the Montreal Gazette.

And in Ottawa, dozens of pro-Palestinian demonstrators gathered outside City Hall, calling for an end to the attack.

In a statement on Saturday, Minister of Foreign Affairs Lawrence Cannon pleaded for calm in the region, urging both sides to negotiate a renewed ceasefire and strive for peace.

"Canada is deeply concerned by the escalation of violence in southern Israel and the Gaza Strip and by the loss of life and the suffering sustained by all sides," he said.

He added, however, that "Israel has a clear right to defend itself against the continued rocket attacks by Palestinian militant groups which have deliberately targeted civilians. First and foremost, those rocket attacks must stop. At the same time, we urge both sides to use all efforts to avoid civilian casualties and to create the conditions to allow safe and unhindered humanitarian access to those in need in Gaza."

In a statement from Israel, Moshe Ronen, chair of the Canada-Israel Committee, thanked Cannon for his comments on behalf of the Canadian Jewish community.

"Every country has the right and obligation to protect its citizens. Israel is doing no less than Canada would, could and should do under similar circumstances," Ronen said.

"Hamas has made victims of both Israelis and Palestinians," he added. "Every casualty rests with Hamas – whether in Sderot, Kiryat Gat or Gaza City. Until it abandons its murderous dogma, no one will be safe, and no peace, which we seek, is within reach."

In another statement, B'nai Brith Canada said Israel has "a duty" to defend its citizens.

Frank Dimant, B'nai Brith's executive vice-president, called the loss of life "tragic" while urging the world to "recognize that the Gaza Strip... is nothing more than a breeding ground for terrorists that seek to destroy the Jewish State."

Miriam Ziv, Israel's ambassador to Canada, was en route back here from Israel on Monday and could not be reached for comment, according to an Israeli Embassy spokesperson.

In response to the weekend protests, Israeli consul general in Toronto, Amir Gissin, told The CJN he appreciated much of the Canadian media's "truthful" coverage of the IDF's offensive, saying Israel had been rightly portrayed as taking action only after "a very long time of terror and harassment toward Israeli towns and communities."

He was disappointed, however, in "exaggerations" of the number of protesters some media outlets reported on the demonstration in Toronto, saying he observed what looked like 200 pro-Palestinian demonstrators outside his office and not 800, as reported by the Canadian Press.

Gissin said he felt that most Canadians did not identify with calls to blame Israel for the weekend's violence.

"Because everybody knows [Hamas] is on the other side and what kind of instability and terror they want to create," he said. "I think the true picture should be conveyed. Not too many people [in Canada] support that. On the contrary, I think most people understand that sometimes you have to fight in order to defend your cities."

Lawrence Cannon

Gissin said that while he could not predict what would happen next in Gaza, one thing is certain: "We will do our utmost to change realities on the ground and bring peace and quiet to the South of Israel. And we hope along the way, a new coalition will be created to let the moderate powers prevail and continue negotiation towards peace."

On Sunday, Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas said Hamas could have prevented Israel's attack on the Gaza Strip, calling on Hamas to renew its cease-fire with Israel.

"We spoke to them and told them, 'Please, we ask you not to end the cease-fire. Let it continue,'" Abbas said during a news conference with Egyptian Foreign Minister Ahmed Aboul Gheit. "We want to protect the Gaza Strip. We don't want it to be destroyed."

Abbas also called the continuing rocket attacks on Israel "acts of foolishness."

Palestinian Authority officials in Ramallah said Saturday that Abbas' Fatah party, which rules the West Bank, was prepared to assume control of Gaza if Israel topples the Hamas regime there.

Family Caregiver Connections Project launched

Not many group home options available for mentally ill Jews

"With the number of calls we get and the number we are able to actually address, it's really quite sad."

Goldman-Brown added that Chai Tikvah does not promote its services because there are only so many beds and it's not able to fully address the needs of the community.

"Number 1, they have to fit our criteria to get in, and number 2, the waiting list is usually a few years," she said.

"Rachel," who has a son who suffers from schizophrenia who currently lives at Chai Tikvah, said she learned about the home by chance – before she even knew her son would need it – when a friend came to visit her when she was sitting shivah for her late husband. The friend suggested that she donate all her excess food from the shivah to Chai Tikvah.

After her son spent months in and out of hospitals and she was faced with the option of sending her son to live in non-Jewish group homes in small Ontario towns such as Woodstock and Lindsay, she suddenly remembered hearing about Chai Tikvah.

She managed to get her son into the home after one of the residents moved out to live more independently.

"But what about all the others who are waiting to get into a home?" she asked.

"Heavens knows I've talked to so many people, and as soon as I start talking about it, they start telling me about a family member."

Rachel said it was important for her son to live at Chai Tikvah because "he had a strong Jewish upbringing, and I wanted him close to the family. He has no one else. He's single, he never married. He's got his aunts and uncles here, his brother, his mother. What was he going to do in Woodstock or Lindsay?"

Although Rachel is encouraged by the allotment of 15 apartments in the Lebovic centre, she said Chai Tikvah is being asked to raise $250,000 for administrative fees, which she thinks will be difficult.

Despite the fact that there aren't many group home options for mentally ill Jews, there are programs available for those who suffer from mental illness, and their caregivers.

Devora Schwartz-Waxman, the Family Caregiver Connections co-ordinator at the Circle of Care, a non-profit provider of in-home health and support services, spoke to The CJN about a new initiative to help people who are caring for aging or ailing family members.

Seven agencies, Circle of Care, Baycrest, Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living, Chai Tikvah Foundation, Jewish Family & Child, Jewish Immigrant Aid Services Toronto and Reena, have joined forces to create the Family Caregiver Connections Project.

Schwartz-Waxman said one aspect of the project is to help elderly parents who care for adult children to prepare for a time when they are no longer able to do so.

"We work with caregivers who have children who have mental health issues and help them prepare for [the problems that come with] aging. The other end is people who are caring for seniors who have mental health issues," she said.

"There is a lot of planning if the parents have kept their kids at home all along, and now the mother who has looked after the child all along has dementia and the child is in their 60s and is starting to have age-related health issues – it becomes a very complicated situation."

She said the project provides assistance to aging caregivers by encouraging them to take time out for themselves without feeling guilty, and helping them with financial planning.

Jack Kugelmass, a social worker who has experience in the Jewish community, said that UJA Federation also has a task force on inclusion, which operates out of the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre.

Jack Kugelmass

"Federation has an inclusion initiative in an effort to include diverse groups who otherwise are disenfranchised and may not feel included. I'm talking about people with developmental needs and physical handicaps," Kugelmass said.

Jewish Family and Child (JF&C) executive director Richard Cummings and JF&C supervisor and social worker Fay Geitzhals spoke about programs their organization provides to people who suffer from any number of challenges.

The Toronto Jewish Healing Project, which operates in JF&C's chaplaincy service, tries to help people cope with illness and despair and to further a sense of well-being, comfort and guidance through the support of the Jewish community.

But Cummings said that while the project isn't exclusive to helping those coping with mental illness, there are other services, such as individual counselling for the mentally ill.

"We have programs ranging from individual counselling to a wonderful service we provide called the Bagel Club, which is a once weekly social opportunity for a wide range of adults ranging from 20 to 70 who come in and break bread together," Cummings said. "It really is a life line for people who are terribly socially isolated, marginalized and stigmatized."

Geitzhals said that the 20 to 25 people who come to the Bagel Club each week are not so different from others.

"They just have another issue to deal with in life. It would make a big difference if people were to know what it's like," she said.

"At the end of the day, if we're a community that can be more inclusive, if we're a community that can be more compassionate, you make more room for people and they fit in better," Cummings said.

"We wish we could do more," Geitzhals said.

Part 3 of this series will examine the ways in which the Jewish community can work to improve the resources available for the mentally ill and their families.

For information, call Schwartz-Waxman at 416-635-2900, ext. 413; Goldman-Brown at 905-886-6520; or Cummings at 416-638-7800.

Survivors' stories on menu at Yad Vashem dinner

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Though the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem bills the event as a Dinner of Miracles, it is much more than an excuse for a meal, said Avner Shalev, chair of Yad Vashem's directorate in Jerusalem. It is "a meeting, an affair, an encounter," he noted.

It is also "a dialogue between generations," said Yaron Ashkenazi, executive director of the organization's Canadian arm.

This year, some 550 people gathered at the Sephardic Kehila Centre in Thornhill for the fourth annual dinner. The event brought together 150 Holocaust survivors, 300 young adults and others in a unique format in which the aging victims of the Shoah were able to relate in detail the stories of their lives. Each dinner table featured two or three survivors and seven or eight young people, most of them Jewish – about 50 not – in an informal atmosphere.

The young professionals, who ranged in age from 20 to 40, were eager to hear their grandparents' generation describe their wartime experiences. The 50 non-Jewish participants were invited by the local affiliate of the International Christian Embassy in Jerusalem. Yad Vashem maintains close ties with the Christian organization, which supports the museum's mission and raises funds for its works, Shalev said.

The Dinner of Miracles was co-sponsored by the Azrieli Foundation, which also supports Yad Vashem's efforts to publish the memoirs of Holocaust survivors.

The dinner was held shortly before Chanukah, and in keeping with the holiday season, Shalev brought with him an artifact from the Yad Vashem collection, a small brass chanukiyah.

The chanukiyah belonged to a young Dutch Jew, Willy Tal, given to him as a bar mitzvah present from his father, Felix. When the war started, Felix rented a small room in Amsterdam, where he hid the family's valuables, including the chanukiyah. Around the same time, Willie, then 17, went to work as a male nurse in a Jewish hospital for the mentally ill. After more than a year at work, Willy was told of a planned Nazi "aktion," which would see the patients and staff deported. Willy refused to leave his patients and was caught in the Nazi roundup. In January 1943, they were transported en masse to Auschwitz. Most of the patients were killed immediately, and Willie was gassed in April of that year.

The chanukiyah was retrieved after the war by Willie's sister, Flory Asscher, who survived in hiding along with her parents. Last October, she presented the chanukiyah to Yad Vashem, adding to the museum's collection of artifacts, Shalev said.

The objects provide a tangible link to the personal stories of the Shoah victims. "The heart and core of the museum deals with human stories… We describe the Shoah through human stories," he said.

It also provided a jumping-off point to the evening's discussions. Yad Vashem hopes to duplicate the Dinner of Miracles in other Canadian cities. The support group has already received calls inquiring about the event from Winnipeg and Montreal, Ashkenazi said.

In the meantime, Yad Vashem is pressing ahead with one of its ambitious projects – recording the names of all six million Holocaust victims. Based on survivor testimony and the release of Soviet-era documentation, Yad Vashem now has 3.5 million names and expects that total to rise in April to four million as staff work their way through the Soviet materials. The museum's Hall of Names is designed to hold six million victims' names, Shalev said.

The Canadian Society for Yad Vashem has supported the Jerusalem museum with close to $7 million raised in the last four years, Ashkenazi said. Most of those funds are earmarked for the museum's educational programs.

A full accounting for Hamas terror

Once the Hamas leaders who govern Gaza decided last month to reject the extension of the six-month ceasefire with Israel, renewed fighting was essentially assured. But when they decided, by contrast, to renew their campaign of rocket and missile terror against the Israelis of the Negev, an Israeli response was a matter both of self-defence and of justice.

That response began last Saturday, eight days after the truce expired.

Israel's response has been unabating, precise and punishing. There is no denying the extent of the carnage and the heavy toll that has been exacted on the people in Gaza. But the point must be emphasized and re-emhasized that the target of the Israeli operation is the terrorist organization Hamas.

It is Hamas' infrastructure, operational capabilities, command structure and deeply murderous ways that Israel has now determined to stop.

Again and again, as recently as last Friday, the government of Israel urged and pleaded with the Hamas leadership to abandon its incessant rocket attacks against the citizens of Israel. But to no avail. The rocket campaign intensified. In the eight days after the expiry of the truce, Hamas fired some 300 rockets and mortars at Israel. In the preceding 12 months, Hamas had fired more than 3,000 rockets and mortars at Israel.

The mischievous hand of Tehran has been clearly at play behind the scenes, joined in a solidarity of violence and hatred with Ismail Haniyeh and Khaled Meshal, Hamas' two self-appointed leaders.

As of this writing, the Israel Defence Forces have blasted away at Hamas' military training camps, rocket-manufacturing facilities, weapons warehouses, tunnels used to smuggle weapons, and political strongholds for three days.

According to Palestinian sources, more than 300 Palestinians have been killed, the vast majority of them terrorists and militants. Several hundred Palestinians have been wounded. Alas, Palestinian civilians too have been caught in the mayhem, in the deadly web of deliberate exploitation practised upon them by their own leaders.

Two Israelis have been killed and about 20 wounded.

When asked on the weekend who was responsible for the current fighting in Gaza, Egyptian Foreign Minister Ahmed Aboul Gheit answered: "Ask the party that controls Gaza."

Israel's actions against Hamas are justified. No country on earth would leave unanswered the wave upon wave of missile and rocket terror that Israel has had to endure. Israel has a right to defend its citizens. And after all other non-military options failed to prevent the rocket fire, this military response seems to be the only way.

Victor Abadi, a jeweller in Aleppo, Syria, returned home from work to find his pregnant wife and two children murdered and their bodies mutilated. The news came to Judy Feld Carr, director of the Dr. Ronald Feld Fund for Jews in Arab Countries at Toronto's Beth Tzedec Congregation, who warned about the increasing dangers facing Syrian Jews.

Lenient sentence for firebomber

Sadly, the Canadian judicial system has missed an opportunity to assert any meaningful influence in the fight against terrorism ("Firebomber gets four years in jail," Toronto edition; "'Terrorist' firebombings net four-year jail term," Montreal edition, CJN, Nov. 27).

To think that Azim Ibragimov could perpetrate acts of terror against the Montreal Jewish community by firebombing our institutions and receive a sentence of only four years is pathetic and laughable. Had this act taken place in the United States, this individual would probably not see the light of day for decades. As a result of this abhorrently lenient sentence, Canada has now hung out the proverbial shingle to terrorists around the world: "Welcome to Canada. We are open for business."

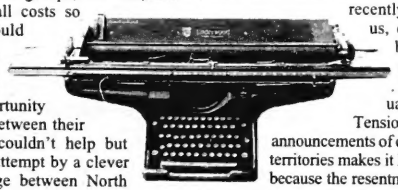
Skeptical about Muslim/ Jewish 'twinning'

I'd be a lot more enthusiastic about the "enthusiasm and goodwill" engendered during the weekend of "twinning" of mosques and synagogues were it not for the giant elephant in the interfaith parlour ("Muslims, Jews bond over Abraham," CJN, Dec. 4). I'm referring, of course, to Israel, the Jewish state that gives rise to so much friction between the two groups, the "elephant" that had to be ignored at all costs so that the warm feelings could blossom. Call me a skeptic, but while many Canadian Muslims and Jews saw this weekend as a unique opportunity to build bonds and bridges between their communities, I'm afraid I couldn't help but see it as something else: an attempt by a clever Saudi king to drive a wedge between North American Jews and the Jewish state.



I say that because this "twinning" project is part of King Abdullah's larger "interfaith" scheme. At the international level, it consists of hosting conferences and lobbying the United Nations to prohibit "defamation" of religion (so no one will be able to say anything critical about his religion); in North America, it consists of this twinning effort, a way for Muslims and Jews to "get past" the primary impediment to their building a relationship – that pesky Jewish state. And ultimately, that's precisely what the Saudi king aims to do – get past Israel, i.e. consign it to the past. The reason he's so keen for it to be gone is that for someone with his worldview, Jewish sovereignty in Israel is an insult to Islam and its doctrines.

Of course, not too many Jews would be willing to partake of his hospitality were he to make his intentions so obvious. For that reason, he has had the good sense to make them more palatable by dressing them up in the sheep's clothing of "peace" and "interfaith dialogue" and "our common Patriarch, Abraham."

In its 60 years of existence, Israel has withstood every military offensive its enemies have thrown at it. With well-intended but dangerously naive North American Jews backing it, however, the Wahhabis' "charm" offensive may yet succeed where tanks, intifadahs, aerial bombardment and suicide bombers have failed.

Idea of Jerusalem undivided will backfire

Recently, I read Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's comments recommending giving back disputed sections of the West Bank, Jerusalem and the Golan Heights. He argues that doing so is the only way to preserve Israel in the future. Then I read that the new Jerusalem mayor, Nir Barkat, elected without the participation of the Palestinians, plans to build more settlements for young Jewish couples in Jerusalem.

People, we are messing this up. The idea of a Jerusalem undivided – an idea I also cherished until recently – is going to backfire on us, quite literally. We must give back disputed territories or we risk losing the whole country, because we are creating a situation that cannot be sustained. Tension created by Israeli government announcements of continued settlement in disputed territories makes it harder for Jews in the Diaspora, because the resentment and pain it causes spreads, as any university student will tell you. The more we cling to hawkishness, the more we worsen the situation for Jewish people all over the world, as we endanger the lives of Jewish people within Israel.

We must admit that the measures we take to ensure our security are ultimately illusory and do not provide security at all. Rather, they ensure instability and a continued state of war. It's time for every Jew to say, "enough." Let's every single one of us take a good look at the map of Israel, and the ridiculous little bits of land we insist on hanging on to out of spite. If we love the land as much as we say we do, we have to share it or we risk losing it all.

IAF strike is Israel's version of 'shock and awe'

By AMOS HAREL

The events along Israel's southern front, which commenced at 11:30 a.m. on Dec. 27, are the closest thing there is to a war between Israel and the Islamist terrorist group Hamas. At the time of publication of The CJN, it is difficult to ascertain (geographically) how far the violence will reach and how long it will continue before international intervention forces call a halt to the hostilities.

However, Israel's opening salvo was not merely another "surgical" operation or pinpoint strike. This was the harshest Israel Defence Forces assault on Gaza since the territory was captured during the Six Day War in 1967.

Palestinian sources in Gaza reported that 40 targets were destroyed in a span of three to five minutes. This was a massive attack, much along the lines of what the Americans termed "shock and awe" during their invasion of Iraq in March 2003, with simultaneous, heavy bombardment of a number of targets on which Israel spent months gathering intelligence.

The military "target bank" includes dozens of additional targets linked to Hamas, some of which will certainly come under attack in the coming days.

As in the U.S. assault on Iraq and the Israeli response to the abduction of IDF reservists Eldad Regev and Ehud Goldwasser at the outset of the Second Lebanon War, little to no weight was apparently given to the question of harming innocent civilians. From Israel's standpoint, Hamas, which persistently fires rockets while using the civilian population as cover, had plenty of opportunities to save face and lower its demands. In stubbornly continuing to launch rockets in recent weeks, it brought this assault on itself.

A final decision on the precise timing of the operation was made on Saturday morning in consultations between Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, Defence Minister Ehud Barak, the IDF chief of staff Lt.-Gen. Gabi Ashkenazi, and army generals. The cabinet approved the assault in its Dec. 24 meeting.

After that, the government waited for the opportunity to strike. Apparently, an intelligence tip indicating that members of the Hamas military wing were convening for a meeting expedited the decision-making process and gave the go-ahead to act.

According to initial reports from Gaza, a number of senior Hamas officials were hit, yet the scope of the harm done to the group's leadership has yet to be precisely determined. The Israeli objective is clear: deal as serious a blow as possible to the Hamas chain of command in order to hinder its operating capabilities. It may not prevent heavy rocket fire from reaching the Negev towns, but it will likely make it more difficult for Hamas to carry out the more damaging attacks against Israel.

From last Saturday afternoon until early this week, the IAF maintained a significant presence in the skies over Gaza in hopes of intercepting rocket-launching cells belonging to Hamas and Islamic Jihad. But the rocket barrage that rained down on Netivot this past weekend (where one Israeli was killed by a Grad rocket which directly struck a house), Ashkelon and the communities abutting the Gaza Strip was only the appetizer.

The defence establishment was girding for a daily round of rocket fire that was expected to exceed 100 projectiles, some of which are likely to reach the maximum range currently within Hamas' capability – 40 kilometres, a distance that extends to the outskirts of Be'er Sheva and Ashdod.

It would be reasonable to assume that Hamas is preparing to spring another Hezbollah-style operational surprise, from attempting to shoot down IAF aircraft to targeting key strategic sites such as the Ashdod port.

The IDF Home Front Command therefore launched a massive deployment of its forces on Monday, tasked with instructing the residents of the Negev to remain in their homes (the urgency of the instruction is proportional to the residents' proximity to the Gaza Strip). In addition, a few hundred reservist soldiers received call-up notices.

Israel's continued hesitation to take further action against Hamas is rooted in the trauma it suffered in the wake of the Second Lebanon War. The major question, of course, is not related to the operational capabilities of the air force, but to whether or not to launch a ground invasion. Would the government resolve to do so and is the IDF capable of successfully carrying out a mission such as the one it failed in against Hezbollah?

Until such decisions are made, the IAF was expected to continue its assault, complemented by limited activity from relatively small ground units.

As of Monday, it appeared that Israel has assigned modest goals for itself: weakening Hamas' rule in Gaza and restoring a prolonged lull along the border under terms that are more convenient for Israel following an internationally imposed compromise. Hamas, in its continued strikes on the Negev in recent weeks, erred in judging Israeli intentions and has been dragged into a war that it is doubtful it wanted. Now, Israel needs to be careful not to fall into a trap of its own.

Opinions

Who's looking out for Gilad?

It was a moment of inspiration: 1,000 Montreal Jews huddled together in a synagogue for a memorial service for the victims of the Mumbai massacre and Chabad House. Chassidic, Reform, Conservative, Orthodox, Sephardi and Ashkenazi Jews all came. It was a powerful display of Jewish unity.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

But afterward, I was left with a nagging doubt: would this unity last? Much like the old saying, "There are no atheists in foxholes," there are no quarrels during tragedies. Disasters have the unique ability to unite Jews in common cause.

But when things get more comfortable, our unity fades. At the beginning of the intifadah, thousands of Jews rallied in support of Israel. It was a critical moment, a time "when the chips were down," and even haredi Jews who wouldn't consider themselves Zionists came to support the Jewish state. But once the violence quieted down, people stopped expressing their support for Israel. Jewish unity is much more difficult to achieve in good times.

In difficult times, our hearts are touched by others' suffering. Empathy can affect even the most evil human beings. While murdering six million Jews, Adolf Hitler went out of his way to spare the life of his mother's Jewish doctor. Empathy is so powerful an emotion that even Hitler could empathize with a Jew he knew.

But empathy isn't enough. Our commitment to others goes beyond gut reactions. What's required is a hard-headed sense of responsibility. True responsibility isn't affected by emotional fluctuations.

Responsibility is greatest toward your family. Judah, when asking to take charge of his younger brother, Benjamin, says to his father, "I myself will guarantee his safety. You can hold me personally responsible for him."

Judah's proclamation stands as the paradigm of Jewish responsibility, of how every Jew is responsible for one another.

Yet, we have forgotten one lonely, lost Jew. All of us should be asking ourselves: "Where is Gilad?" On June 25, 2006, Gilad Schalit was abducted by Hamas. Since then, he has not heard the voices of his parents, his siblings or his friends.

Sadly, other voices also remain silent. Jews around the world do too little to call for Gilad's release. It's time we take our responsibility to Gilad seriously.

The Canadian Rabbinic Caucus has initiated a letter-writing campaign on Shalit's behalf entitled "Where is Gilad?". (At www.cicweb.ca, you can quickly fill out an e-mail form that goes to multiple MPs.)

We must raise our voices with the Shalit family and ask "Where is Gilad?" But we must also wonder why we have done so little. Where are Judah's descendants now to say, "You can hold me personally responsible for him"? Where is the State of Israel? Where is the Jewish community?

Canadian Jews should follow Cotler on Iran

For years, Jews have watched in frustration as Iran has progressed in its demented but determined march to develop nuclear weapons. Our community leaders have been as impotent as the leaders of the world's great democracies, including Canada, the United States, Great Britain and Israel. But in early December, former federal justice minister Irwin Cotler launched an initiative that may provide some badly needed traction in this struggle.

Gil Troy in Montreal

Cotler marked the 60th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide by demanding that the United Nations and the world sanction Iran for threatening Israel with genocide.

In a twist worthy of a lawyer who understands that ugly words spawn evil actions, Cotler wants to punish Iran for crimes it has clearly committed – calling for genocide – while sidestepping the murkier debate over Iran's nuclear ambitions.

True, it's hypocritical that self-styled European pacifists tolerate Iran's nuclear plans. True, the idea of a nuclear Iran is terrifying, considering the Middle East arms race it would trigger, and the boost it would give Iran's terrorist twins, Hezbollah and Hamas, let alone the danger to Israel and the United States, which Iran frequently threatens. Still, people can disagree about Iran's nuclear intentions. By contrast, Iran's genocidal threats are unambiguous, easily documented, and patently illegal.

The Holocaust taught us that the world cannot be casual about dictators who threaten genocide. This insight spurred the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Never again should a dictator be allowed to threaten mass murder with impunity.

The case against Iran is well documented, and chilling. Parading a missile through Tehran with the words "Wipe Israel off the Map" as mobs scream "Death to Israel" constitutes genocidal incitement. Cotler nearly gags as he quotes Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's characterization of Israel as "a filthy germ," "a stain of disgrace" and "a stinking corpse."

Cotler's action plan is clear. Countries such as Canada should lead, starting by referring the case to the UN Security Council, as Article 8 of the Genocide Convention mandates. Sanctions and boycotts, as well as filings at the High Court of Justice or the International Criminal Court, should follow. Meanwhile, German companies – who together make Germany Iran's largest trading partner – and other corporations must be confronted with their moral responsibility, given Iran's repeated calls for genocide.

Iran should be treated as a pariah, even suspended from the United Nations, unless this criminal rhetoric stops. This push is not a one-man crusade. Cotler filed an 80-page petition with the endorsement of other human rights activists, including the former UN high commissioner for human rights, Louise Arbour. Arbour has repeatedly blasted Israeli policy. But to her credit, she, too, recognized that if human rights means anything, for international law to maintain any credibility, it must remain illegal for UN member states to threaten to annihilate other member states.

Canada's Jewish community should follow Cotler's cues. Institutional leaders and individuals should do whatever they can to press Ottawa, the UN, the United States, NGOs and human rights activists to punish Iran.

As the creaky apparatus of international law tries to find redemption – after decades of irrelevance and biased demonization of Israel – activists should run with this effort to outfox Iran. All Iranian governmental representatives, wherever they travel, should face public denunciations or ostracism, similar to what Soviet diplomats endured in the 1970s. And all the human rights hypocrites who demonize Israel should be confronted repeatedly with the following question: "Before we talk about human rights anywhere else, I want to know if you condemn Iran's explicit calls for genocide of a fellow member of the United Nations?"

If Cotler's case is compelling enough to get Arbour's assent, there should be other surprising allies that emerge, too. Alas, as of this writing, the Canadian Jewish community has been silent on Cotler's initiative. This isn't a time for dithering or making nice. We need vigorous, visionary leadership to turn Iran's ugly threats against itself and threaten Iran with pariah status. We must explain to our fellow citizens and MPs that if human rights in the 21st century is to mean anything, this is the first test case.

Where are our leaders – and our institutions – when we need them?

America's first Jewish president?

African-American novelist and Nobel prize winner Toni Morrison once famously asserted that former United States president Bill Clinton was America's "first black president." In a 1998 New Yorker article, Morrison said that Clinton was "blacker than any actual black person who could ever be elected in our children's lifetime."

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

History, of course, has proven Morrison wrong. A mere decade after her controversial statement, the recent U.S. election posed an interesting coda to her article. And now U.S. Judge Abner Mikva has declared Barack Obama to be America's "first Jewish president." Riffing on Morrison's turn of phrase, Mikva – a former congressman from Chicago, a former University of Chicago law professor and a retired federal judge – describes Obama as possessing a "yiddishe neshumah," a "Jewish soul."

What did Morrison mean and what does Mikva mean in making these statements?

Somewhat satirically, Morrison's article suggested that Clinton be considered "black" not racially, but culturally, saying he exemplified "almost every trope of blackness: single-parent household, born poor, working-class, saxophone-playing, McDonald's-and-junk-food-loving boy from Arkansas."

Written as Clinton was facing impeachment by the U.S. House of Representatives, Morrison compared what she saw as his unjustified persecution to the threat that hung over even successful black men in America. "No matter how smart you are, how hard you work, how much coin you earn for us, we will put you in your place or put you out of the place you have somehow… achieved. You will be fired from your job, sent away in disgrace." She later explained that she was trying to convey that Clinton was "treated like a black on the street, already guilty, already a perp."

The characterization took on a life of its own and was used frequently to evoke Clinton's many friendships with, and appointments of, African-Americans and his sensitivity to the history and consequences of racism in America.

Mikva, the child of Jewish immigrant parents from a shtetl on the Russian-Polish border, sees in Obama, whom he mentored, quintessentially Jewish values – a "yiddishe neshumah," a person with "a sensitive, sympathetic personality… who understands where you are coming from."

Reading accounts of Mikva's declaration about the president-elect reminded me of when I first learned about Mikva, this politician and statesman with the distinctively Jewish name. I was in graduate school, and friends from Chicago spoke of him as a source of personal inspiration.

Now in his early 80s, with a reputation for personal integrity, Mikva was raised with a strong, secular sense of Jewish identity by a father who was profoundly influenced by the atheism and anarchism of the Russian Revolution. With no formal religious training, Mikva absorbed the Yiddish language of his household. His connection with Judaism was forged by his more religious grandfather, who would "sneak" young Abner into shul against his father's wishes. In one of history's ironies, Mikva's daughter became a rabbi.

If we were to probe Mikva's recent statement about Obama further, to develop it more substantially, as Morrison did with her remark about Clinton, we might see other reasons why he referred to Obama as "Jewish."

It's easy to imagine that the former judge would have been attracted to another child of a father from elsewhere, who – as a member of a minority facing the obstacles of prejudice – had to figure out how he fit into America's promise and reality. The tropes of Jewishness, to borrow Morrison's locution, include much that Obama exemplifies: the value of education, close relations with grandparents, contending with suspicions, dual loyalties, being saddled with an odd name, negotiating a sense of identity that is at once particular and universal, being cosmopolitan, urban, and eloquent – the latter being seen as both positive (a mark of intelligence) and negative (a tool of deceit). Moreover, in the culture wars of the recent election campaigns, Obama's side did not sit comfortably with hunting and shooting. What could be more Jewish?

Most importantly perhaps, for a man who lived through the civil rights era and knew that the Jewish historical experience motivated many U.S. Jews to struggle on behalf of others, Mikva surely sees in Obama someone who similarly learns from and embraces, but also transcends, the historical struggle of the people with whom he most closely identifies.

The Kirshner File

Stalin's biographer turns his attention to Jerusalem

The gradual dissolution of the Soviet Union from the late 1980s onward riveted, among others, a young British investment banker named Simon Sebag Montefiore, the scion of a long line of Jewish bankers.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Montefiore, whose ancestor was Sir Moses Montefiore, a legendary 19th-century financier and philanthropist related to the Rothschild clan, was working in New York City as the Soviet empire broke up in an incremental sea change.

A pent-up writer whose imagination was fired by this historic event, he dropped everything, even his cushy job in the concrete canyons of Manhattan, to witness these momentous developments on a first-hand basis. Embarking on what would be "a great adventure," and carrying little more than rudimentary possessions, he threw himself into the thick of things as he travelled around the tottering Soviet Union, particularly the Caucasus, Ukraine and Central Asia.

"I saw history being made," said Montefiore, who, as a freelance foreign correspondent, recorded his impressions for a raft of British and American publications ranging from the Sunday Times and the Daily Mail to the Spectator and the New Republic. "Everywhere I went, there was civil war and chaos."

Over the next few years, he regularly visited fairly remote destinations from Georgia to Azerbajan. These trips not only further whetted his appetite for writing. They also strengthened his interest in Russia, the ancestral home of his mother's family.

"All my books come from that period," said Montefiore, who lives in London with his wife, Santa Palmer-Tomkinson, a best-selling author of romantic historical fiction, and their two children, Lily and Sasha.

Since then, Montefiore, 43, has churned out a succession of historical works, as well as one novel, on Russia. Best-sellers, they have been published in no less than 33 languages, a fact that clearly attests to his popularity as a historian.

Catherine the Great and Potemkin, a sweeping epic of love, sex, power and conquest about a German princess-cum-empress who ruled Russia as a reformer until her death in 1796, was Montefiore's first history book, and was published in 2000.

He followed that up with two rigorous biographies of Joseph Stalin, the Soviet dictator. Stalin: The Court of the Red Tsar appeared in 2003, and Young Stalin, which Miramax is currently developing into a feature film, came out several years later. Sashenka, an intricately plotted novel about a Russian Jewish family based on many true stories and revolving around a beautiful, rich and headstrong woman, was published in 2008.

In keeping with his yen for newly discovered facts, Montefiore thoroughly researched each of his books. As a reporter in the now-defunct Soviet Union, he came to realize that Russian archives were ripe for the picking, and that he needed to learn Russian in order to mine them.

Learning the language was easier than gaining access to heretofore sealed archives in Georgia and Moscow. Yet in the face of seemingly endless frustrations and stress, Montefiore prevailed, unearthing new material that considerably brightened up his books and prompted a famous British publisher, Lord Weidenfeld, to observe: "It is very rare to find a historian capable of such serious research and such journalistic verve."

Montefiore's persistence and hard work paid off in spades, enabling him to draw original and nuanced portraits of his subjects, be they Stalin, Catherine's lover Grigory Potemkin, or the fictional Jewish woman Sashenka Zeitlin. Thanks to the archival gems he found, Montefiore was able to draw a rounded picture of Stalin's personality.

As he puts it in Stalin: The Court of the Red Tsar: "The new archives confirm that his real genius was something different – and surprising. He could charm people. He was what is now known as a 'people person.' While incapable of true empathy on one hand, he was a master of friendships on the other. He constantly lost his temper, but when he set his mind to charming a man, he was irresistible."

Although he does not admire him and believes he was intrinsically evil, Montefiore contends that Stalin – a Georgian born as Josef Vissarionovich Djugashvili – was a hugely important, fascinating, complex and misunderstood leader without whose material support World War II and the battle against Nazism could not have been won.

Stalin's anti-Semitism sprouted later in his life. "He didn't start off as an anti-Semite," said Montefiore, who was recently in Toronto as a guest of the International Festival of Authors. "There is no real tradition of anti-Semitism in Georgia." In Stalin: The Court of the Red Tsar, Montefiore writes that Stalin was always suspicious of Jews, because they lacked a homeland and thus gave him the impression that they were mystical, intangible and otherworldly. But Stalin's Jewish confederate, Lazar Kagonowich, maintained that Stalin's view was formed by the Jewishness of his political enemies, notably Trotsky, Zinoviev and Kamenev.

Simon Sebag Montefiore

Stalin, he says, emerged as a "vicious and obsessional" anti-Semite after 1945, when he grew ever more wary of the United States and noticed that the Holocaust had touched and awakened Soviet Jews. In his view, he may well have gone through with his plan to deport Jewish citizens to Siberia had he not died so suddenly. "The evidence for this is very dodgy, but he was certainly capable of it, and personally orchestrated the Doctors' Plot."

Despite Montefiore's immense interest in Stalin, he rates his book on Catherine the Great as his favourite, due to her zeal as a forward-looking westernizer and her long romance with Potemkin. He disputes allegations that she was an anti-Semite.

Montefiore contends that Sashenka was a labour of love, one of the happiest experiences of his career. "I always wanted to write it. It's a real Jewish story. But I must tell you that many people thought I was insane to try something so different."

As he points out in his acknowledgements, Sashenka was, in part, inspired by archival tales of the Jewish wives of Stalin's henchmen and the arrests of writers such as Isaac Babel.

Currently, he is working on a book on Jerusalem through three millennia and the lives of its kings, conquerors and creators. Scheduled to be published in September 2010, it is a pet project, given his fascination with the Middle East and his family's connections to Israel.

"It'll be hard to write, because there is so much material," said Montefiore, whose father is descended from a line of wealthy Moroccan and Italian Jews. "I expect it to be my biggest challenge."

Montefiore's great-great uncle, Sir Moses Montefiore, was born in Livorno, Italy, in 1784 and settled in Britain as a young man. His wife, Judith Cohen, whom he married in 1812, was related to Nathan Meyer Rothschild, for whom Montefiore's stock brokerage firm acted as a representative. Retiring at the age of 40, Moses Montefiore was president of the Board of Deputies of British Jews for 39 years, a tenure that has never been matched.

A protector of distressed Jews in the Diaspora, Montefiore was also a benefactor of the Jewish community in Jerusalem. The windmill that was built with his money still stands as a beacon in Yemin Moshe.

"He was an astonishing and amazing character," said Montefiore, who counts among his friends Prince Charles and the British Conservative party leader, David Cameron. "He used the prestige of the British empire to help persecuted Jews all over the world and his fortune to beautify and expand Jerusalem. He was an admirable person in every respect."

Veteran teacher 'always on the floor' with young kids

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Lorna Leibovici, a nursery and Grade 1 general studies teacher at Associated Hebrew Schools' Posluns Education Centre, has a choice of seats in her two classrooms.

In her Grade 1 classroom, there's a student-sized chair that's been hand-painted for her and adorned with the words "Mrs. Leibovici's special chair." Another one is labelled her "magic power chair" and is stationed in front of a computer. There's also a tall, shapely stool known as the "throne," which is sometimes used for reading stories, or she might sit on a wicker rocker in the nursery classroom.

But she says she rarely sits in a chair.

"I'll show you exactly how I sit in the morning," she said in a before-school interview, nimbly assuming a cross-legged position on the floor of her nursery classroom.

"I'm always on the floor, and I'm never clean. I had blue under my nails for two weeks from painting Maccabees."

A veteran educator with more energy than some of her younger counterparts, Leibovici has worked at Associated for the better part of three decades, following a five-year stint at Or Haemet Sephardic School.

As a longtime teacher, "you have to be open-minded, willing to learn and willing to try [new things]... I think you really have to stretch yourself," she said.

Despite her experience in education, she tells her students that she's "still a little kid. I've just been around longer."

As a child, the Toronto native used to set up her dolls classroom-style at home. Her sister would sit with them, and the future teacher would preside at the front of her "class," entering marks in a workbook and blowing a pretend pitch pipe before asking them to sing.

After high school, she attended Lakeshore Teachers College, then began her career teaching Grade 2 and kindergarten at Wilmington Avenue Public School before taking time off to stay home with her two young sons. She earned her primary specialist's certification through a summer course.

Leibovici enjoys her work so much that she said everyone should have an opportunity to spend a few days in a primary classroom like hers. "You can be yourself. You can be happy. You can sing."

Notwithstanding her effervescent personality, the fact that she starts and ends each school day with a song, and the warmth she demonstrates by signing all the children's work with a smiley face and the words, "Love, Mrs. L.," inside a heart, Leibovici said she is "very strict.

"I truly believe students have to be respectful of their school, of their environment, and of each other. I try to enforce it in a nice way.

"Their time in school should be joyful."

A lesson from the teacher: Leibovici shares this mantra with students who are having difficulty, pointedly ticking off each word on the fingers of one hand: "The more you do it, the better you get... and then you get to be the best."

Jewish material added to genealogical site

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

The Internet-based genealogical company Ancestry.com has added a major series of Jewish collections to its website, including many data bases that may be searched free of charge for users who open a free account.

Ancestry's recently added Jewish Family History Collection offers a wide assortment of Jewish tax lists, voters lists, business directories, police registration lists, Holocaust records, cemetery transcriptions, nominal indexes and other resources, many related to places in eastern Europe in the 19th century. Countries and regions represented include Austria, Belarus, Bessarabia, France, Galicia, Germany, Hungary, Latvia, Lithuania, Moldova, Poland, Romania and Russia, as well as Australia, Canada, England and the United States.

The data bases were originally accessible only at the popular website Jewishgen.org, and are still available there. A volunteer-built, non-commercial site known as the home of Jewish genealogy on the Internet, Jewishgen recently signed an agreement allowing Ancestry to offer the data bases simultaneously.

The deal helps Jewishgen attain valuable new funding and gives Ancestry a valuable new customer base. A third party to the agreement is the American Joint Distribution Committee.

I typed the generic Jewish name "Abraham Cohen" into the search engine and clicked on the search button. Up came an impressive list of hits. There are 308 Abraham Cohens in the JewishGen Online Worldwide Burial Registry – 15 in a list of U.S. consular posts in Israel from 1857 to 1935; five in a Belarus names index; three in a list of US civil war veterans. Good old Abe appears everywhere from Galveston to Galicia. There are more than 100 linked data bases to explore, some requiring an Ancestry subscription. The name Sarah Levy produces a similar cornucopia of references.

The field narrows considerably, however, when one types in a less common name such as Naftolin, the surname of my maternal grandparents from Belarus. Up comes a variety of Lithuanian birth, marriage, divorce and passport records, as well as material from Belarus, Canada and the United States.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

By RABBI WAYNE ALLEN

There was once a fellow who lost his way and had to make inquiries as to how far he was from his destination.

A wizened old man on the road told him, "If you continue to go in the direction you are going, it's about 25,000 miles. But if you turn around, it's about three."

The Hebrew word for repentance derives from the same root meaning as the word for "to turn around." Proceeding in the wrong direction can be as much a waste of time as it is frustrating. The same can be said about perpetuating bad habits or complacently continuing misdeeds.

Sometimes we just need to turn around.

Sensitive to this idea, the Jewish calendar is punctuated with moments that are particularly helpful for changing direction.

On four days during the year, we are encouraged to check the road map of our lives to see if, in fact, we are going in the right direction or if we must turn ourselves around.

One such day falls on Jan. 6, 2009. It's called a "fast day" – specifically, the Fast of the 10th of Tevet, the 10th day of the 10th biblical month.

But to think of it only as a day of self-abnegation misses the point entirely.

In his exposition of Jewish law called the Mishneh Torah (Laws of Fast Days 1:1), Moses Maimonides, explains that while there is a historical remembrance attached to each of the four fast days – with the 10th of Tevet commemorating the beginning of the Babylonian siege of Jerusalem under Nebuchadnezzar in the sixth century BCE – the purpose of each of these days is "to arouse all hearts and open the paths of repentance; to be a recollection of our evil ways… that has caused us such grief."

These fast days are opportunities for us to measure how well we're doing in the good we're doing – or are supposed to be doing.

In particular, the 10th of Tevet comes a mere three months after Yom Kippur. It's a kind of seasonal check-up to determine whether our observance of the Day of Atonement has had any measurable impact on our behaviour. Before we let too much time pass, we need to evaluate whether or not we're going in the right direction. It's far easier and far better to go back a few months and recommit to the words we recited on Yom Kippur than to proceed and be lost for the rest of the year.

In a moment of reflection, American poet Edna St. Vincent Millay once said: "It is not true that life is one damn thing after another – it's one damn thing over and over." This sad observation is true unless we are willing to change.

That change is possible only when we take the time and make the effort. The 10th of Tevet is an appropriate time to start.

Rabbi Allen is the spiritual leader of Beth Tikvah Synagogue in Toronto.

Moving from Genesis to Exodus

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

As the book of Genesis ends and we begin reading the book of Exodus, a number of threads from Genesis continue into Exodus. Certainly, the fate of the Israelites at the end of Genesis is left unresolved, as the clan of Jacob's descendants returns to Egypt and we are told of Joseph's death. The fate of these descendants plays out in the opening chapters of Exodus. They are foreigners in a foreign land and are quickly enslaved.

The end of Genesis presents a picture of the Israelites being sustained – safe and secure – by Joseph. The book of Exodus quickly moves things toward persecution and slavery. The narrative progression from one book to the other takes a positive picture and shows its quick progression into the negative. Interestingly, the portrayal of the female between these two books unfolds in the opposite direction.

Joseph's life is largely framed by the absence of a woman's presence. His mother, Rachel, dies while giving birth to his younger brother, Benjamin. With Rachel's death, all female voices in the family stop. Joseph is the victim of isolation, favouritism and, ultimately, kidnapping, slavery and imprisonment.

Throughout the book of Genesis, the image of the well – water from within the earth – is strongly connected with the female. We meet many of our matriarchs at wells, and the image of life-giving water speaks strongly of the female's life-affirming qualities. Not surprisingly, when Joseph is kidnapped by his brothers, he is thrown into a pit that the text tells us "has no water." Joseph's life is repeatedly missing the life-affirming qualities of the female as he is thrown from pit to pit.

From the stark absence of the female in the Joseph narrative, the book of Exodus quickly moves us to the strong informing voices of the women in Egypt

Years later, Jacob, Joseph's father, will lie on his deathbed and bless Joseph with the blessing of "breasts and womb," the compassion of the female. As Joseph's father, Jacob is trying to bless his son with the very things that he sees were absent.

From the stark absence of the female in the Joseph narrative, the book of Exodus quickly moves us to the strong informing voices of the women in Egypt. When Pharaoh decrees that baby boys are to be killed on birthing stones, it's the midwives who refuse to execute the order.

When Pharaoh decrees that all baby boys are to be drowned in the Nile, it's Yochevet who disobeys, and it's Miriam who protects and Pharaoh's daughter who saves. If not for these women, Moses would have shared the fate of the other baby boys, and there would have been no redemption.

While we read, sadly, of the decline of the Israelites after Joseph dies, at the same time, the text brings women's voices back to the forefront, and we begin to hope. Throughout the text of Exodus, women will continue to be life-affirming and grounding for that generation and beyond.

The Talmud speaks often of the honour and respect that we owe to our parents, but it captures the uniqueness of a woman when it tells us that when Rabbi Joseph heard the sound of his mother's footsteps, he would say, "I must rise before the presence that is now approaching."

Babylonians and the Bible

By ALEX GROPPER

Past Forward

The land of Babylon had a profound impact on the development of Israel and its faith. Although Egypt is featured prominently in biblical stories, it is generally conceded by scholars that Babylon and its environs had a much greater impact on Jews as a people, as well as on our history.

Archeology can tell us much about this relationship. During excavations in the latter part of the 19th century, in Mesopotamia, where Babylonia was located, cuneiform tablets were discovered. When the cuneiform was translated, scholars found stories that bore striking similarities to certain biblical stories.

Some of these documents were originally discovered in the palace of the great Assyrian ruler, Ashurbanipal, whose library was one of the greatest collections of documents in antiquity. It was the discovery of this library that alerted scholars to documents, in this case cuneiform tablets that were copies of texts that belonged to a much earlier period.

We would not have been able to read these stories if it were not for our ability to decipher cuneiform. In a great feat of scholarship, cuneiform was first deciphered in the 1850s. Unlike hieroglyphics, which took more than two decades after Napoleon's soldiers discovered the Rosetta Stone imbedded in the walls of Fort Rashid to crack, cuneiform took less than a decade to decipher, after the discovery of the Behistun Inscription, in western Iran, that provided the key to its decipherment.

Once the decipherment had been accomplished, scholars could get to work and translate the myriad documents that were being dug up in various sites in Mesopotamia, or modern Iraq, which at that time was a backwater province of the decaying Ottoman Empire.

As in Egypt, it was the British and French who vied with each other to see who could uncover the most sites. By and large, it was the British who succeeded, but by the end of the 19th century, Americans and Germans had also gotten into the act. In fact, it was the Germans, under Robert Koldewey, who began the systematic excavations of Babylon at the end of the 19th century

What they turned up were myriad documents written on clay tablets, and in the process, they even uncovered hitherto unknown civilizations such as that of the Sumerians, who are generally credited with inventing civilization. This discovery has been celebrated in the book History Begins at Sumer, written by the eminent American Sumerologist and Yale professor, Samuel Noah Kramer.

One of the things the Sumerians invented was cuneiform writing. By the middle of the third millennium BCE, they had used cuneiform to write down the world's first great story, the Epic of Gilgamesh. In this story, a flood that is similar to the one in the Bible is mentioned. However, this story is at least 1,500 to 2,000 years older than the story of Noah.

In the Epic, a place very much like the Garden of Eden, called Dilmun, is mentioned. The English archeologist Geoffrey Bibby wrote a fascinating book called Searching for Dilmun, in which he attempts to equate the island of Bahrain with this mythical land.

Another fascinating discovery was made by French archeologists at the end of the 19th century at the site of Tello. It was a law code belonging to Hammurabi, king of the first dynasty of Babylon, circa 1750 BCE. The code is now exhibited in the Louvre, in Paris.

Some of the laws bear a striking similarity to biblical injunctions belonging to the lex talonis type ("eye for an eye, tooth for a tooth"). Once again, scholars have dated them to a much earlier period than those found in the Bible.

However, it was the Babylonian destruction of Jerusalem and the First Temple in 586 BCE, as well as the subsequent captivity of the Jews, that would leave an indelible mark on our history, as we will see in my next column.

Ancient Jewish coins

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The Jewish Highway

So did you get gelt?

No, not the chocolate kind but honest-to-goodness gelt. Maybe you were lucky enough to receive a genuine Judaean coin for Chanukah. Or perhaps you want to know more about the ancient Jewish coins tucked away in the back of your drawer. Here's where you should invest some time to learn about them – and our history.

For a good introduction into minting in the Land of Israel, check out Ancient Coins of the Jewish People. [tinyurl.com/anccoins] Coins were first minted in Gaza about 400 BCE and later in Jerusalem about 500 years later. The earliest coin known to be minted in Jerusalem bears a picture of a lily and the word "Yehud." In what was an incredible symmetry with the past, the Bank of Israel reproduced this same design when it issued its One New Sheqel coin in 1985. [tinyurl.com/yehud]

From there, click over to the Handbook of Biblical Numismatics [tinyurl.com/bibnumis] and the informative but dated entry at JewishEncyclopedia.com. [tinyurl.com/jewnumis] Now, you are ready to appreciate the Menorah Coin Project, which calls itself the world's No. 1 databank on biblical/Judaean coins. There are thousands of images of coins to pore over. [menorahcoinproject.org]

In Exodus 20:4, we are warned against making "a graven image, nor any manner of likeness of any thing that is in heaven above or that is in the earth beneath or that is in the water under the earth." [tinyurl.com/torah-graven] That restriction posed a challenge to Jews who began minting coins from the reign of Hasmonean king John Hyrcanus in 134 BCE to the end of the Second Revolt in 135 C.E. Unlike the Persians, Syrians, Egyptians and Romans who decorated their coins with busts of their emperors, the Jews turned elsewhere for inspiration. See Lulavs, Lilies, and Lyres in Jewish Heritage Online Magazine. [jhom.com/topics/money]

Are you sitting on a cache of coins from the time of the Maccabees – or a hoard from the time of Herod – and want to find out what they're worth? Then join in at the Forum Ancient Coins' biblical and Judean coins numismatics discussion board. Not only do most people pose questions, but they also scan their coins. One person wanted to know whether his coin really was an antique. The answer: "This is [a] modern coin. The easy way to tell is the Hebrew on the coin – it is new Hebrew, not ancient." [tinyurl.com/coinforum]

How would a resident of ancient Jerusalem feel if he could hold a handful of modern Israeli change? Strange familiarity. Since the State of Israel was founded, its mint has always looked to the past for the designs and symbols to engrave onto its coins. The Jerusalem Through Coins website does a great job of illustrating ancient coins with grapes, pomegranates and, of course, menorahs, alongside their modern counterparts. (Note: page loads slowly and some images are missing.) [tinyurl.com/oldnewcoins]

Before you buy, be careful! In Ancient Coins & Modern Fakes, Dennis Kroh writes about notorious and common coin scams. "There have been forgeries of ancient coins for as long as there has been coinage." Novices to coin collecting are amazed that coins of the ancient world are obtainable at all for any price. (They are all in museums, aren't they!) Kroh says it's no wonder that when a tourist purchases an "ancient" coin or two, they are usually paying much more for a counterfeit than what the authentic item would cost. Although his essay doesn't focus on Israel or Internet sales, virtual travellers should keep its lessons in mind. [tinyurl.com/fakecoins]

When you take time to examine a coin, it usually looks perfect. But that's not always the case. The Israel Error Coins site has some interesting blunders, including double strikes, brockages and clipped planchets. But my favourite error can't be blamed on a mechanical breakdown, just some faulty proofreading. It's the Israeli medallion embossed with the English inscription, "SEASONS GREATINGS." [geocities.com/israelerrorcoins]

Rabbis hone business skills to deal with changing times

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Three Toronto rabbis were among 56 rabbis, executive directors of synagogues, and other Jewish leaders who honed their business skills earlier this month at an intensive, invitation-only, four-day program at Northwestern University's prestigious Kellogg School of Management in Evanston, Ill.

"There has been a general trend over the last 10 years to recognize that rabbis in particular have a need for developing certain skills that are needed for synagogue management, in addition to what has been the traditional skill set – the ability to study and teach Torah; to lead tfillah; to guide, advise and counsel people; and to preside over life-cycle events," Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl of Beth Tzedec Congregation told The CJN.

Certain skills needed for synagogue management

The rabbi is on the advisory board of the newly established program – called Kellogg Management Education for Jewish Leaders – which included sessions on conflict resolution and negotiation skills, marketing and leadership, financial management, crisis management, and fundraising.

Rabbi Michael Dolgin of Temple Sinai Congregation and Rabbi Chaim Strauchler of Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, along with their shul's respective executive directors, as well as Beth Tzedec's executive director, were the other delegates from Canada. Most participants were American, while five were from the United Kingdom. The Reform, Conservative and Orthodox movements were equally represented.

"I think for a long time we had the idea that we don't want to be a business," said Rabbi Frydman-Kohl.

Synagogues are more similar to non-profit than for-profit businesses, but the not-for-profit model is not an exact fit, either, he said.

However, he noted, there are "large swaths of ideas" from the business world that are applicable to synagogue life.

"One of the big differences is that corporations are managed by CEOs and COOs and CFOs, and that determines the direction of the company… The same is true of large not-for-profits, but synagogues are really much more like communities, like small towns or villages, so there are different relationships, and the rabbi or executive director doesn't simply determine the direction, but rather the lay leadership and the membership play a significant role in concert and in dialogue with the religious and professional leadership."

Requests from rabbis led to the development of the program, the school said in a press release. It added that a 2006 survey of Conservative rabbis and lay leaders found that lay leaders want their rabbis to "do more as fundraisers and managers of people."

Rabbi Strauchler, who came to Shaarei Shomayim in August, noted that because of the nature of western society, with its large number of dual-income couples, many organizations don't get the type of volunteer involvement they did a generation ago.

"As people's time is more limited, more of the responsibility falls on the professional staff," he said.

The rabbi – who was a Rhodes scholar at Oxford University in 2001 and has a background in science, English literature and Bible – said there is "certainly a learning curve.

"It's difficult, but I also believe it's rewarding… championing our most essential organizations."

The blindness of the right

By MICHAEL BROWN

Guest Voice

In her op-ed "The wrong-headedness of the left," in The CJN on Nov. 27, Sally Zerker presents readers with a catalogue of the villainy and tyranny of 20th-century dictators, all of them identified as being on the "left."

For a Jew, for any Canadian, her list is astonishing. Adolf Hitler, the greatest villain of all history, certainly of Jewish history, is mentioned only in passing; that the Nazi minions were on the right of the political spectrum is not mentioned at all.

Also drawing a pass from Zerker are Mussolini, Tojo, several centuries of Russian czars, Hungarian, Romanian and Polish fascists of the pre-World War II period and beyond, the neo-Nazis of today's Ukraine, Belarus and elsewhere, South American dictators, and a host of others. Not to mention them is odd from a Jewish standpoint, to say the least, but it would have been inconvenient for the argument. They don't fit the ideology of the essay.

A balanced and fair view of the historical record would note that the traditional anti-Semitism of the right accounts for much of Jews' attraction to the left. The example of Chief Rabbi Dov Berush Meisels of Krakow, impeccably Orthodox and an opponent of modernity, is instructive. Rabbi Meisels was a Polish patriot and a champion of national rights, his traditionalist Judaism notwithstanding. In 1848, he was elected to the democratic Austro-Hungarian Parliament.

At the first session of the Parliament, to the surprise of many, Meisels took his seat with the radicals on the left. When someone tried to direct him to the "right" of the hall, he responded with a pun. "Jews have no right," he said, meaning that with the right, Jews had no rights.

To be sure, many leftist regimes have exacted a communal and religious price from Jews for full membership. Most, however, granted equal rights to Jews and others as individuals. Historically, they have been, at worst, the lesser of two evils.

To be sure, much support for Israel has come most recently from the religious and political right in North America and, to a degree, in Europe. That is a relatively recent phenomenon. Before 1948, it was usually the left, including union members and liberal Protestants, who championed the establishment of a Jewish state. In 1948, the support of U.S. president Harry Truman (a Democrat) was crucial; the State Department (largely conservative diplomats concerned about oil), however, vigorously opposed him. The USSR and its satellites also supported the establishment of the state, for their own reasons, to be sure, and communist Czechoslavakia supplied large quantities of arms to the beleaguered yishuv.

Whether the recent shift to the right of the Jewish community has alienated the left or the anti-Israel rhetoric of the left has sparked the shift to the right is a chicken and egg question. But if we are to learn anything from history, it behooves us to remember that it wasn't always so.

History aside, it seems to me inaccurate, at best, to apply the notions of right and left to the economic situation of the present. "Socialist" has been made into a term of opprobrium by the ideologues of the right. But who are the greater socialists, the major banks and corporations that beg for and receive subsistence allowances from government, or the homeless and the unemployed?

And let us not be deceived. It is not only the present crisis that has brought those corporations cap in hand to Ottawa, Washington, European capitals and even Beijing. That those who seek tax breaks for the rich and prosperous and writeoffs for corporations are seen as devout capitalists, while those who seek tax breaks and other benefits for the less well off are seen as "socialists," is a triumph of obfuscating, ideological spin.

To be sure, the left is not always right, and the right is not always wrong. But our community and the country would be best served by a fair and honest evaluation of both. A careful reading of the past and present might enable us to formulate a reasonable policy for the future.

Organizations expect delayed fallout

To prepare, Maerov said, "We're going over our operating budgets with a fine-tooth comb to see how we can optimize on the revenue side, but equally important, we're looking for every place where we can delay or eliminate an expense so we reduce our potential deficit."

At UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, the annual campaign reached $56.6 million by the end of December, "up by roughly $2 million over last year at this time," said spokesperson Howard English. The campaign began in mid-August and closes in February.

Because of the economy, donors are not being asked to up their pledges as in years past. However, many people have increased their gifts, said English. "Not too many" of the 18,600 donors have decreased their pledges, he added.

Federation leaders are in contact with funded agencies to learn about increased community needs, said English. "There is a general recognition that... the requirements for funding will increase, and I think that is motivating the philanthropic behaviour of our donors."

"I think in general we're beginning to see some of the signals," said Richard Cummings, executive director of Jewish Family and Child (JF&C), last month. He had just learned of two clients on the agency's child welfare caseload who were laid off due to the economic downturn, he said.

JF&C's clientele includes individuals, children and families affected by child abuse, woman abuse, and challenged by mental health problems. "An economic downturn increases [their] numbers, increases the symptoms, and challenges our funding and our fundraising in general," said Cummings.

The agency, which is funded by the Ontario government, United Way and UJA Federation, provides counselling and financial assistance to clients living below the poverty line. An estimated 13 per cent of the Jewish community lives in poverty.

JF&C is also a member of the Jewish Poverty Action Group, which is implementing a pilot program to help working poor families become self-sufficient. Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS) Toronto, Kehilla Residential Programme, JVS, Reena and Canadian Jewish Congress are also involved in the project.

"We're working to develop strategies in areas of... affordable housing and social inclusion," said Cummings. "We believe those are significant factors that can shift the circumstances of families."

A safety net for about 110 families – the kosher food bank at the Pride of Israel Synagogue – has also been affected by economic conditions. Last month, funding uncertainty had the service on the brink of imminent closure.

Janis Roth

Its weekly budget is about $700. Synagogue food drives have helped "tremendously," said food-bank chair Alan Marks, but smaller donations are also appreciated. If "a sizable number" of people donated $5 a month, "it would take the pressure off completely."

Janis Roth, executive director of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS), told The CJN that her agency's greatest concern is that it will take people longer to find jobs and that some people who recently started working will be laid off. Also, she noted, JIAS' clients include younger wage earners supporting their own families as well as senior relatives.

JIAS funding issues are less pressing than they might be, because its annual federation allocation runs until the end of June, Roth said.

The organization's own campaign was scheduled to start last month. "We're just waiting to see what happens," said Roth.

She said the agency is not looking at cutting back programs, but is investigating ways of streamlining.

Seymour Epstein, senior vice-president of UJA Federation, the Centre for Enhancement of Jewish Education (the Mercaz), said that Jewish schools are vulnerable to the changing economy in two ways. One is fundraising, and the other is the impact on middle-income parents who may find it "difficult to maintain tuition."

However, he said, he is "generally optimistic" because of the "high level of commitment" to the schools both by parents and the community.

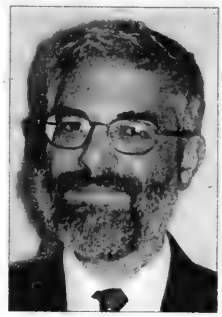
At Associated Hebrew Schools, executive director Arthur Landa said that in November, "a handful" of full-fee-paying parents had applied for tuition assistance. He added that some of those who were already receiving it had inquired about increasing the amount. However, the number is "not significantly different" than in any other year, he said.

Associated has 1,700 students, including the largest number on financial assistance at any Jewish day school in Toronto (about 40 per cent).

Landa said that fundraising challenges will not have any direct impact on students. "It just means the school will likely incur a larger deficit than originally anticipated.

For the past year, Landa noted, school efforts have focused on its centennial and related fundraising. "We have to get back to basics such as our annual campaign and our continuous search for major donors."

He said the "biggest change may be with respect to the middle-class family" who might consider enrolling their children in public school to avoid Associated's $11,500 tuition. Landa estimates the school has "at least a couple of hundred families" who fall into that category.



Rabbi Reuven Tradburks

For many Orthodox families, however, alternatives to Jewish day schools are not seen as a viable option.

The Vaad Harabonim of Toronto, the city's organization of Orthodox rabbis, released a statement last month expressing concern over pressure on Orthodox elementary schools and yeshivas.

"The vast majority of any school's budget is teacher salaries," the statement reads in part. "If a school were unable to meet its payroll, the teachers and the rebbeim would suffer."

The statement emphasized the importance of taking personal responsibility for extending compassion and tzedakah "both to organizations that help those in need, and to our local schools."

Of some two dozen Orthodox schools in the city, the majority do not receive federation funding, said Rabbi Reuven Tradburks, president of the Vaad.

He noted that their teachers, particularly those with large families, would be hard-hit in the area of tuition for their own children.

But there is at least one organization in the Jewish community where the economic downturn might be seen as having a more positive bottom-line impact.

As of late November, State of Israel Bonds Canada had not experienced any adverse effects of the downturn, which hit shortly after many people made annual Bonds pledges on Yom Kippur, said Elan Levitan, vice-president of State of Israel Bonds Canada.

Compared to the stock market, people see the Israeli government-issued bonds as "a safe haven" that has a "flawless" record of repayment dating back to the early 1950s, Levitan said.

"Thus far we appear to be having a business-as-usual year."

Musicians in a hot band find life chaotic, gruelling and fun

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

When high school buddies Mike Kirsh and Mike Wise used to play gigs at Toronto-area Indigo bookstores, they had no idea that years later, they'd be touring as part of one of Canada's hottest bands.

Bassist Kirsh and guitarist Wise, both 23, make up the Jewish half of the Midway State, a pop-rock band that is forcing music lovers to perk up their ears and pay attention to four young boys who have developed a sound that's often compared to music industry giants such as Coldplay and Keane.

Guitarist Mike Wise

Originally from Collingwood, Ont., lead singer, songwriter and pianist Nathan Ferraro formed the band in 2002, with his best friend, Daenen Bramberger, the drummer; Ryan Horning on guitar; and Adam Beamish on bass.

After about three years of touring and songwriting, Midway State caught the attention of Juno Award-winning producer Gavin Brown, known for his work with artists Billy Talent and Three Days Grace.

Horning and Beamish were fired from the band, and Ferraro and Bramberger decided to post an ad at the University of Toronto in hopes of finding musicians who could contribute to the sound they were striving for.

"I was going to school at U of T, and I was studying music at the time. I joined the band and shortly after they needed a bass player. I was friends with Mike and I used to play with him, so as soon as he moved back to Toronto, when he finished school at [the University of Western Ontario], he joined the band," Wise said.

Bassist Mike Kirsh

Kirsh said, "I was at Western getting a BA, like all Jewish kids do," adding that at that point he didn't know what career path he wanted to take.

"I was taking media information. I don't know what I was thinking," he said with a laugh.

Three years later, Wise and Kirsh are part of a band that has toured across North America, opening for acts such as Avril Lavigne, Theory of a Deadman, Evanescence, and Collective Soul.

"When we first started touring, we were both new as a group of guys and a band, and we sort of felt like four guys thrown together into a band, because we didn't really know each other," Wise said.

"By touring, we really quickly bonded and before we knew it we were dressing the same and speaking the same and we became best friends really quickly."

While there were aspects of touring that would fit the stereotypical rock star cliches – the drinking, the partying, and the girls – Wise said that there's another side of touring that isn't nearly as glamorous.

"There is also the non-exciting part that you wouldn't think of, like loading your gear and waking up in the morning to do interviews," he said.

Kirsh said, "It's chaotic. But it's a good kind of chaotic. You just have to let it happen."

Since then, the band's popularity has been gaining momentum. In 2007, one of their songs, Unaware, was played during the final minutes of a hit TV show, The O.C., and their current single, Never Again, spent more than 15 weeks on the MuchMusic countdown – hitting the No. 1 spot in November.

"We got to open for a band called Evanescence in Paris last spring in this stadium of like, 10,000 people. And we were really well received and I think it was our first really big show like that, so it was a lot of fun," Wise said.

Kirsh added, "We had no idea what to expect, and we were really happy with the response. I mean, we were halfway around the world and they were totally getting it, so that was awesome."

Despite their success, both Kirsh and Wise are grounded and don't take their good fortune for granted.

"We all work extremely hard, you know. We're in the studio every day, six days a week, 10 hours a day for months. It was gruelling but a lot of fun, and the final product is really rewarding for me," Kirsh said, referring to the production of Holes, Midway State's debut album, which was released in 2008.

Wise said, "We strive to have a modern sound but also to have original songwriting elements there," adding that Ferraro, who writes most of their songs, is also influenced by older songwriters such as Carol King, Peter Gabriel and Neil Young.

Despite the fact that music was always a big part of their lives, neither of them could have predicted they'd land careers as rock musicians.

"I always wanted to be in a band and what-not, but for me it was a struggle figuring out if I wanted to pursue a career in music. I guess I kind of slowly fell into it," Wise said.

"It was always a dream for me, but it wasn't the only thing I thought I could do. Had I sucked at everything else, maybe it would have been more clear. But I felt like I had other avenues I could go down. It wasn't the clearest decision for me when I was younger, but now, it's super cool."

Kirsh added: "I always thought it would be so great because it's what I love to do the most."

The boys, both graduates of Thornhill Secondary School, spoke about the tight-knit Jewish community that they're part of and the support they've received from many of their Jewish peers.

"It's kind of cool because the non-Jewish half of our band is always amazed at how much our Jewish friends want to help out in any way they can," Wise said.

Although the boys say that they're having the time of their lives, their busy schedule doesn't leave them much time for a social life.

"It's a bit weird with the touring schedule, being on and off the road at different times, coming back to your friends and leaving them for a few months, and their world goes on," Kirsh said.

Wise added, "Also, our schedule is super volatile. We might be home one day, and then we find out in two days that we're going to the States for a month to tour. So things come up at the last minute for us, and because we're all so committed, we have to make ourselves available all the time.

"It can make us flaky. You cancel things and you can't commit to things, and you can't plan trips three months from now because of it. But I'm fine with that because I want to be doing this... But to any of my friends who are reading this article, I apologize for cancelling on you for anything."

Kirsh said, trailing off, laughing, "And to any of my girlfriends..."

They're currently enjoying some time off, but they are getting set to release and promote their newest single and music video called Change For You.

For more information about the band and upcoming tour dates, visit www.themidwaystate.com or www.myspace.com/themidwaystate.

Liberal's coalition negotiator speaks out

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Bloc Québécois were prepared to keep a Liberal-led coalition government alive for two years, if the coalition allowed Bill 101 to apply to federally regulated companies in Quebec.

But Marlene Jennings, the veteran Liberal MP in charge of negotiating the coalition deal for the Liberals, said "no way" to the Bloc.

The proposed change to the province's French language law would have allowed employees of federally regulated companies, including post offices and banks, to conduct business in French only.

"I said no. Never. Not while I have a breath in my body," Jennings told a recent breakfast gathering at Shaare Zedek Congregation.

And the result, said the 11-year Notre-Dame-de-Grâce–Lachine MP, was that the Liberals settled for the Bloc pledging to prop up the Liberal-NDP coalition during confidence votes for 18 months, not two years.

The coalition agreement to govern was formed because the Liberals, the New Democratic Party and the Bloc opposed the Conservative's government November economic update. A confidence vote to oust the Conservatives was to take place in early December.

Jennings, the deputy House leader for the official Opposition, was the negotiator of the proposed coalition during a frantic weekend in early December, because Ralph Goodale, the Liberal Opposition's House leader, was out of town for the weekend.

The whole coalition issue, however, became moot – at least temporarily – after Governor General Michaëlle Jean agreed to Prime Minister Stephen Harper's request to have his threatened Conservative minority government suspended – or prorogued – until the House reconvenes Jan. 26 for the throne speech.

For Jennings, 57, the idea of having Bill 101 apply to federal institutions in Quebec was unacceptable.

"I was able to [say no] because I knew that for people in my riding, and English-speaking communities, and the Jewish community, and other communities, Bill 101 is anathema… for a variety of reasons," she said.

"So I felt I had your support – that you had my back – to make sure that nothing went into those agreements… that would be detrimental to our communities."

Another coup, she said, was that the Bloc agreed, in writing, to take sovereignty off its agenda for the 18-month period, which was deemed long enough to see if the economic stimulus program the Liberals, the NDP and the Bloc proposed was working.

"I'm quite proud of it," Jennings said, "because it's the first time in the 18 years [since] the Bloc was first founded, that the Bloc, in writing, took sovereignty off its agenda, if the agreement was put into action.

"No other party, no other government has been able to do that."

Marlene Jennings, Notre-Dame-de-Grâce–Lachine member of Parliament

Several times Jennings adamantly denied there was a "coalition" at all.

"There is no coalition," she said. "None, regardless of what Mr. Harper and ministers of his government are saying…

"The governance agreement only would have become operative had the Governor General asked the leader of the official Opposition to see if it could form an alternative government."

And that didn't happen.

She said there were, in fact, two agreements she negotiated: a "governance agreement" hammered out with NDP leader Jack Layton that would make the Liberal leader prime minister, and a separate "policy agreement" with the NDP and Bloc on an economic stimulus package that included the Bloc's commitment not to defeat the Liberal-led government for 18 months.

Jennings said the Bloc did not take part in the governance negotiations.

Instead of the word "coalition," Jennings said she preferred the term "co-operative government" to describe the deal with the NDP, contingent on Bloc support. If the coalition government ever came into power, Liberal leader Michael Ignatieff would become prime minister and preserve "his authority and prerogatives," including cabinet appointments – six of them from the NDP.

However, Jennings said if Harper tables a budget on Jan. 27 that is acceptable to the Liberals in providing appropriate economic stimulus, they would vote in favour of it and keep the Conservative government alive.

Jennings said the fact that the NDP and Bloc have already stated that they would vote against the Jan. 27 budget regardless of what it says is why they "are not fit to form a government.

"How do you condemn something you have not even seen?"

Jennings said that Bloc leader Gilles Duceppe "did not come happily" into the policy agreement but did so because he was "pushed by the unions," his support base in Quebec. Similarly, the NDP, she said, was "pushed by the unions" outside Quebec.

Regarding Liberal leader Stéphane Dion's infamous botched videotape – considered by many as Dion's coup de grâce as Liberal leader – she said that Dion rewrote his speech, which was in response to Harper's address to the nation about the political crisis, and kept the video crew from entering his office until close to air time. A broken "focus" button on the camera also contributed to the delay in getting the videotape out.

Ancestry.com gets new material

Ancestry's huge variety of 26,000 data bases – census lists, border crossings, passenger manifests, newspaper obituaries and similar material, ad infinitum – was already the most powerful assortment of genealogical tools on the planet. With the added Jewishgen lists, Ancestry now overshadows Jewishgen as the premier site for Jewish genealogy on the internet.

The site features an introductory essay titled "Where Do I Begin?" by the well-known genealogical publisher Gary Mokotoff. The first step is to record everything you already know about your family, then speak to relatives and others with information about your family.

Mokotoff advises researchers to make full use of Ancestry.com but also to visit Jewishgen.org to use additional important data bases found only there. Two examples are the Jewishgen Family Finder (JGFF), which offers a list of family names and ancestral towns being researched by some 80,000 genealogists worldwide, and the Family Tree of the Jewish People, a data base of more than 2.5 million people.

Mokotoff also suggests becoming involved with a local Jewish genealogical society such as the Jewish Genealogical Society of Toronto (www.jgstoronto.ca).

Winnipeg Jewish Post gets new editor

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Freelance journalist and CJN contributor Rhonda Spivak said that she is excited about assuming her new position as editor of Winnipeg's Jewish Post and News.

"I am looking forward to creating a more dynamic product that will engage readers and help sustain the vibrancy of our community," she said.

Spivak is replacing Matt Bellan, longtime editor and co-owner of the biweekly newspaper, who retired in early December and is selling his share to his brother and partner, Bernie.

The paper had been a weekly until about a year ago, but the brothers decided to print every second week as a result of declining advertising sales.

Bellan said that the paper is doing much better financially and that advertising has picked up over the last year.

He added that he feels relieved to be free of the responsibility of editing the paper after 27 years on the job.

The Post was founded in 1925, and Matt – he had been working there as editor since 1981– Bernie and a third partner, who has been out of the picture for quite some time, bought it in 1984.

In 1987, the partners bought out the Western Jewish News, a longtime competitor of the Post, and merged the two papers into the Jewish Post and News.

Matt Bellan said that when he began working as editor, the Jewish Post was a 12-page publication that served largely as a community bulletin board promoting upcoming events.

"I am proud that I have been able to enlarge the paper and provide more serious news reporting of community issues," he said.

He also takes pride in going to bat for the underdog, particularly a blind social worker who was let go from her employment by a local Jewish social service agency, and an Israeli man involved in a child custody case who was banned from several Jewish institutions because, Bellan believes, his former in-laws are prominent members of the community.

Rhonda Spivak

He also points out that he was the first editor of a Jewish newspaper in North America to openly proclaim that he is gay.

As sole owner, Bernie Bellan, who is also the paper's business manager, said that he is looking to change the focus of the paper by placing more emphasis on local coverage and trying to appeal to a broader segment of the community.

"We are fortunate to have Rhonda as our new editor. She brings with her strong writing and analytical skills and understands the Israeli scene as well or better than any other Canadian Jewish journalist," he said.

Spivak is a native Winnipegger whose connections with Israel go back to 1986 when she attended the Rothberg School for Overseas students at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

A lawyer by training, she is also a member of the Israeli Bar, having articled at the Jerusalem office of the Association for Civil Rights in Israel.

She speaks Hebrew fluently and visits Israel often, where she and her family – she is married to Stephen Corne and they have two children, Leah, 10, and Dov, 9 – have a second home in Netanya.

After staying at home to raise her two children, Spivak began writing as a freelance journalist about two years ago. "I always had a flare for writing," she said.

Her articles have appeared in the Jerusalem Post, Ha'aretz (the English edition), the Winnipeg Free Press, the Vancouver Jewish Independent, the Vancouver Sun, the Ottawa Jewish Bulletin and the Minneapolis American Jewish World, as well as the Jewish Post and News and The CJN.

Her articles have also been distributed widely in the Jewish world by news services on the web, including Israel News, Israel Jewish News, Israpundit, JHeadlines, and Jewish World.

In 2007, Spivak was nominated by the Vancouver Jewish Independent for an award among Jewish journalists in North America, for her coverage of the case of Sam Golubchuk and issues surrounding decisions to terminate his life.

Rights complaint against imam rejected

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Canadian Human Rights Commission won't investigate a complaint against a Montreal imam who allegedly wrote disparagingly, and sometimes with violent intent, about Jews, Christians and other "infidels," as well as homosexuals, women and democracy in general.

The complaint was lodged in April by Marc Lebuis, publisher of a Quebec-base website Point de Bascule (Tipping Point), which aims to raise awareness of what its creators perceive as the threat to western values posed by radical Islam.

Lebuis claimed Abou Hammaad Sulaiman Dameus Al-Hayit disseminated hate propaganda in his book L'Islam ou l'Intégrisme? A la lumière du Qor'an et de la Sounnah (Islam or Fundamentalism? In light of the Qur'an and the Sunna) in the book's third edition, which was published in 2006-07 on the Internet.

The commission found that the writings are not likely to expose members of any identifiable group to hatred or contempt, according to the law.

Among the book excerpts Lebuis cited was that Jews "spread corruption and chaos on Earth," and "unjustly occupy" Palestine for the sole purpose of "filling this land with corruption and transgress the laws of Allah in the name of secularism."

As well, Lebuis alleges the imam wrote that most Jews "seek only material goods and money. Apart from that, they have nothing."

Christianity, according to Lebuis' excerpts, is the reason the West is "full of perversity, corruption and adultery."

Other excerpts state that all "infidels" are "evil… love perversity and "are our enemies," and that Muslims are better than others.

Elsewhere, the imam wrote that democracy is contrary to Islam and that Muslims should overthrow "infidel" rulers whenever they are strong enough to do so.

In an Islamic state, Jews and Christians would keep their religion but pay a fee called the jizyah. "The purpose of the jizyah is to humiliate and punish infidels to encourage them to accept Islam," Lebuis quotes from the book. Those of other faiths or atheists must accept Islam or "be killed."

The author also calls for the extermination of homosexuals.

Commission representative Stéphane Brisson wrote to Lebuis in December that "the majority of the references in [the book] are to 'infidels,' 'miscreants' or 'western women.' These are general, broad and diversified categories that do no constitute an 'identifiable group' under Section 13 of the [Canadian Human Rights] Act."

In the instances where groups that are specifically protected against discrimination are identified, such as homosexuals, Christians and Jews, Brisson writes they "do not seem to promote 'hatred' or 'contempt' according to the criteria set forth in the Taylor case."

Lebuis acknowledged that the purpose of his complaint was to "test the objectivity" of the commission.

Sunnybrook launches cancer program for young women

'Worse prognosis than older women'

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

PYNK, a program launched recently at Sunnybrook's Odette Cancer Centre, aims to provide help and support to young women battling breast cancer.

The name "PYNK" combines pink, the colour associated with breast cancer, with a "y" that stands for young women.

Sunnybrook medical oncologist and University of Toronto associate professor of medicine Dr. Ellen Warner founded the program, together with several young breast cancer survivors and Dr. Judith Weinroth. Weinroth, a general practitioner in oncology, serves as the program's director.

Warner noted that while people tend to consider breast cancer a disease of older women, a significant number of women under the age of 40 develop it. Statistics from a Sunnybrook media release say that of an estimated 8,500 women diagnosed with breast cancer annually, five to 10 per cent of them are women under 40.

"Israeli researchers have shown, and I have seen, too, that young women have a worse time, and have a worse prognosis than older women" Warner said.

Besides the purely medical difficulties, she said, the psychological and social issues around breast cancer in young women is dramatic. Ten years after being diagnosed, she said, women still have difficulty because of the drugs and the treatment, including body image, infertility and weight gain.

"It can destroy marriages, educational opportunities, careers," Warner said.

Tumours in older women tend to be discovered by regular screenings. "But the tumour has to be big enough to be seen on ultrasounds, and young women's may grow too fast for this to be much good," she said.

Symptoms such as lumps (often painless), a clear or bloody discharge from the nipple, or changes in the size, shape or skin of the breast are often ignored in young women, especially if they were recently pregnant or are nursing, she said. This is because pregnancy and nursing can cause many of the same conditions. A delay in diagnosis could have serious consequences, Warner cautioned.

Even when older and younger women were matched stage by stage, younger women do much worse. "We want to figure out why," she said.

Young women diagnosed with breast cancer who join the PYNK program have a first meeting with a nurse and the program co-ordinator. The women are offered support, comfort and information, and then are referred to a surgeon or oncologist. "We can fast-track them," Warner said.

The nurse guides the women through the cancer-treatment system, explaining what is happening, sending them to whatever specialists are best for their particular situation, co-ordinating treatments and hooking them up to support groups.

For young women, fertility can be a major concern. Has she had any children yet? Is her family complete? Will the treatment cause infertility? If she needs surgery, will she still be attractive to her spouse? These are some of their concerns.

The issue is complicated if a woman carries the BRCA1 or BRCA2 gene mutation, a mutation primarily found in Ashkenazi Jewish women, that makes her more prone to breast and ovarian cancer, Warner pointed out.

Weinroth follows up with the women in the program. The program also offers information for the patient's family, as well as access to support groups.

PYNK is supported through fundraising and donations.

For more information, visit the Sunnybrook website, www.sunnybrook.ca, or call the program co-ordinator at 416-480-5000, ext. 1059.

Winnipeg centenarian celebrates his 105th birthday

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Sam Baker has to wear hearing aids now and his knees are bothering him, but he is not complaining.

"I'm as healthy as a horse," said Baker, who celebrated his 105th birthday with family on Dec. 19.

His son, Steven, credits his father's longevity to a lot of walking. "Dad walked 1 1/2 miles a day until he was 95 or 96 and developed some back trouble. I remember one time when he was in his late 70s, he went for a walk and got caught in a thunderstorm. He called for a ride home. He had walked three miles."

Sitting in the concourse at the Asper Jewish Community Centre prior to joining in the regular Tuesday Stay Young Seniors program, Baker greets well-wishers who stop to say hello.

Talking about himself, he said that he was born in Poland, the fifth son of Joe and Zlata Baker. The family came to Winnipeg in 1906, and two sisters were born there.

Baker grew up in West Kildonan in NorthWinnipeg. He attended local public schools until the age of 12, when he left school to work in his father's tannery.

In the 1930s, he was involved in various business ventures in rural Saskatchewan with his brothers. In 1942, he bought Jo-Ann Shop, a lingerie store in Brandon, Man., which he converted into a ladies' apparel shop. He later opened a second women's apparel store, Joy's Frocks, in Yorkton, Sask.

Those were busy times, he said. "I would often work 12-hour days. I would come home for supper then go back to the store to do some bookkeeping."

In 1971, he moved his wife, Joan – they were married 62 years before she died in 2002 – and their three children to Winnipeg. He continued to run his store in Brandon, and came home to Winnipeg on the weekends, before he retired in the mid-1980s.

Currently, Baker lives in a condo with his son. He attends services at the Shaarey Zedek Synagogue and participates in the Stay Young and Gwen Secter seniors programs.

"I don't go out much in the evenings," he said. "I watch television and read the papers."

He gave up driving six years ago. "That was hard. It was like losing my right hand."

Up until last year, he was still travelling to visit his daughters, Michelle and Janice respectively, in Hamilton and Calgary. "I am finished travelling," he said. "My daughters and grandchildren" – he has grandsons in Dallas, Tex. and Toronto, and four great grandchildren – "will have to come here to see me."

"גם לא בפינה הנוראית ליד החלון, כך שהמבוכה בדיוק תאיר עליו באופן תגיגי..." מוסיף מאיר. "הם נראה מלבאים בכל הילדים." אני אומתי. "הם אומרים שלכולם קמנים עץ." מאיר מכבה את מנורת הלילה שלו. "טוב, בבוקר לפנות אותב, ובגדול." נוכמם.

"על מה את מדברת?" אני שואלת בספק. הבן שלי מביט בי בצער, ומסביר: "רציני עץ הפרים יפני, מיצאמרי, לחבסה. מה שמראים כל הזמן בפרסומות בטלוויזיה. זה מגיע עם צעץ קטן, אדמה, כמה זרעים דשנן, ואחרי כמה שבועות הוא גדל. לכולם יש עץ מה. הייתי בטוחה שקיבנו גם לנו, לחנוכה.

אפילו אמרנו לכם, אבל כנראה לא הקשבתם..."

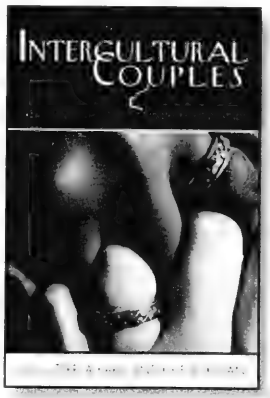
Traditions can survive in inter-cultural marriage: prof

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Not only are interfaith and inter-cultural marriages becoming more commonplace in Canada, but they are also becoming more socially acceptable, said Kyle Killian, co-editor of a new book about inter-cultural couples.

The book, Intercultural Couples: Exploring Diversity in Intimate Relationships, examines relationships that involve partners crossing national, racial, ethnic and religious borders.



"In terms of who's out there to meet and marry, one in five Canadians are immigrants, and one in six Canadians are visible minorities, so it's much more likely now that a relationship is going to be a cross-cultural situation," said Killian, who is an associate professor at York University's faculty of health.

He said that studies available from the 1980s and '90s often suggested that interfaith and inter-cultural couples had a higher divorce rate, so he and his co-editor, Terri Karis, wanted to update the data that was available.

"The research that was out there kind of parallelled society's negativity and hostility towards inter-cultural relationships and inter-cultural marriages, in that it tended to make a lot of negative predictions about the couples. It tended to focus on instability and divorce, and it tended to be rather problem saturated," Killian said.

While Killian found that more recent data suggest that there isn't necessarily a greater possibility of separation or divorce within inter-cultural marriages, he did acknowledge that problems can arise if couples and their families can't compromise when it comes to cultural practices and ceremonies such as weddings.

He said that the second chapter of his book focuses on a Jewish woman who married out of her faith and examined the ways in which the couple struggled to plan a wedding that reflected their cultures in a modern, inclusive way.

For example, they decided to put a modern twist on the tradition of breaking a glass under the chupah by having both the bride and the groom step on the glass together.

He said that what sometimes happens is that an interfaith couple will decide to keep religion and culture out of a wedding entirely, or will choose to focus on one culture rather than try to incorporate both.

"Sometimes, they'll highlight neither, throw the baby out with the bath water and just elope, or have a courthouse ceremony, or maybe just switch to a mainstream, generic ceremony, something you'd see on TV," he said.

"The only trouble with all these solutions is that quite frequently, they are not successful in that one or both sides of the family is not entirely pleased with the resulting ceremony, and if they decide not to have a ceremony at all, a lot of people are going to be upset."

Although Killian was optimistic about the idea that interfaith and intercultural marriages can succeed as often as same-faith marriages do, he understands the concern associated with Jewish intermarriage.

"I'm a family therapist, so I do hear concerns of that kind. I can certainly understand that over the last few centuries and beyond, why people would be expressing concern," he said. "I can see why they would be worried about how individual choices might affect the preserving of the group."

Killian said that the rise in interfaith marriages may have something to do with a trend toward increasing secularism.

"We're not quite as religiously oriented as we might have been a generation ago… That brings up questions about someone who identifies as Jewish in more of a secular way, a cultural way, [and whether] that's going to cut the muster for someone who is more in keeping with religious tradition."

On the other hand, he said, some of the studies based on the population in the Greater Toronto Area that he came across suggest that, particularly in ethnic communities, younger generations are still identifying with the culture of their ancestors.

"They might be getting back to their roots, so to speak," Killian said.

"I think there is room for people to still primarily identify with the cultural beliefs and values that their parents and grandparents brought with them to Canada. I don't think there is any danger of it just evaporating."

In the case of the Jewish woman who intermarried, Killian said that the fact that it was important for her to include Jewish tradition in the ceremony demonstrates that it is likely she will want to include tradition in other aspects of her life, as well, if she chooses to have children.

"If one person is much more religious than the other, it is likely that that particular religious identity will be imparted to the children," he said.

Obituary

Hamilton rebbetzin had deep ties with Ramah

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Gloria Silverman – former rebbetzin of Beth Jacob Synagogue in Hamilton, a teacher and then principal of its Hebrew school, and longtime yoetzet (adviser) at Camp Ramah in Canada – died Dec. 10 at St. Joseph's Hospital in Hamilton, following a lengthy illness. She was 71.

Silverman "found her own way into Jewish life" as a teenager in a Conservative congregation in Bridgeport, Conn., where she grew up.

She met her husband, Rabbi Israel Silverman – then a widower with four small children – when she was on staff at a now-defunct Camp Ramah in New England in 1962, said her daughter Aviva. They married the following year, and had one more child.

Rabbi Silverman, who died five years ago, was serving a congregation in Boston at the time the couple met. He was spiritual leader of Beth Jacob from 1966 to 1996.

The family moved to Hamilton following a two-year stint in New York, where Rabbi Silverman worked for the Jewish Theological Seminary. Gloria had studied at what used to be known as its Teachers Institute.

Aviva Silverman recalls her mother as a "doer" who was in the habit of seeing voids and filling them.

Netta Zweig, Ramah's administrative director and development co-ordinator, remembers Silverman heading to the camp kitchen and preparing Shabbat dinner for 500 when the chef quit on a Friday, she wrote in an e-mail to the Ramah community informing them of Silverman's death.

Former Ramah director Rabbi Mitchell Cohen, now with the National Ramah Commission in New York, told The CJN that Silverman was "the guiding force keeping [the camp] strong on its educational principles. She mentored new directors including myself... She understood every aspect of the camp – it's very rare in a person – and she understood educational priorities. But, also, I'll just remember her and her husband for their menschlich qualities – as sweet, kind, caring people."

The Silvermans were fixtures at Camp Ramah from 1975 until 2002. Rabbi Silverman served as rabbi-in-residence, while Gloria advised counsellors, unit heads and the camp director. For a few years, she ran the camp office over the winter.

A doting grandmother of 16, Silverman took each of her grandchildren, with the exception of the four youngest, on a trip planned around their individual interests for their 10th birthdays. She took two grandsons to Florida to see the Toronto Blue Jays in spring training.

On her own, she was an adventurous traveller, visiting Israel as a young woman and later going to the Grand Canyon, Alaska, Australia and Morocco, recalled her daughter Devorah in a eulogy. To prepare for a trip to Utah, Silverman trained for weeks so that she would be able to hike along with the rest of her group, Devorah added.

At the synagogue, in addition to her involvement with the Hebrew school, Silverman was active in its Out of the Cold program and other social action projects. As well, she taught sisterhood classes in Jewish text study, and organized sisterhood programs.

The first woman to wear a tallit at Beth Jacob, Silverman was also an innovator educationally, developing an educational program for older teenagers, Devorah said.

She leaves her son Judah, of Ottawa; daughters Lanie Goldberg, of Hamilton; Aviva, of Thornhill; Riva, of Norwalk, Conn.; and Devorah, of Teaneck, N.J.; and 16 grandchildren. She was predeceased by her husband Rabbi Israel Silverman, her brothers Howard Sussman of Hawaii, and Allan Sussman of Connecticut.

Ramah alumni are invited to submit e-mail reflections on Silverman's impact, at Ramah@jtsa.edu. Some of them may be included in an upcoming book on the history of Ramah at 60, said Rabbi Cohen. As of press time, the deadline was set for the end of January.

Hamas threatens to assassinate Livni, Barak

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspapers Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Senior Hamas official Fatah Hamad has threatened to assassinate Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni and Defence Minister Ehud Barak.

Livni and Barak were two of the senior Israeli officials Hamas threatened on Sunday, in response to the Israel Defence Forces assault on the Gaza Strip.

He said Hamas would go after senior Palestinian Authority officials in the West Bank, as well as "those in the Arab world who have conspired against us," – an apparent reference to Egypt.

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, however, said that Hamas could have prevented Israel's assault had it only agreed to extend the ceasefire, and he urged it to do so.

Late Sunday, Israel Air Force warplanes attacked a building in the Jebaliya refugee camp next to Gaza City, killing a 14-month-old baby, a Gaza Health Ministry official said.

Earlier Sunday, the IDF massed troops near the Gaza border in preparation for a possible ground operation against Hamas. At the same time, the cabinet approved a relatively small call-up of the reserves – some 6,700 soldiers – in case they are needed for the operation.

Defence sources said, however, that additional reservists may be called up as the fighting continues.

By comparison, only a few thousand reservists were called up in the first days of the Second Lebanon War in 2006. By the end of the war, however, some 62,000 reservists had been called up.

Tzipi Livni

The air force struck more than 100 targets Sunday, the second day of Israel's aerial bombardment of Gaza. According to Palestinian sources, the bombings killed 43 people, bringing the death toll to about 300.

Among the targets were 40 tunnels under the Gaza-Egypt border, which Israel bombed in an effort to shut down Hamas' main conduit for smuggling arms. That operation took four minutes.

Ehud Barak

Most of the targets, however, were in Gaza City, including Hamas Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh's office and the offices of various Palestinian security services. The air force also hit several targets in northern Gaza, the main launching pad for Palestinian rocket strikes on Israel.

Palestinians fired about 30 rockets at Israel on Sunday. For the first time, Sunday's launches included two enhanced Katyusha rockets with a 40-kilometre range. Both landed near Ashdod.

Due to the fighting, southern Israel resembled a ghost town on Sunday. The only vehicles on the roads belonged to journalists, the police and, mainly, the army.

Livni told the foreign media that Israel does not aim to reoccupy Gaza, and government sources said the Foreign Ministry is working on an exit strategy, one that would not involve stationing an international force in Gaza.

Israel promised representatives of international aid organizations that it would continue allowing humanitarian aid into Gaza. On Sunday, the Kerem Shalom crossing was opened to let through 26 trucks carrying food and medical equipment.

By the end of Monday, the third day of Operation Cast Lead, Israel was close to exhausting its target bank for aerial bombing. At that point, it would have to either launch a ground operation or bring the campaign to a speedy conclusion.

Iran weighs in on Gaza

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspapers Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Iran's Ayatollah Ali Khamenei on Sunday issued a religious decree to Muslims around the world, ordering them to defend Palestinians against Israel's attacks on Gaza, state television said.

In his statement on Sunday, Khamenei also criticized some Arab governments for their "encouraging silence" towards Israel's raids on Gaza.

Meanwhile, Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas said on Sunday the Islamist group Hamas could have avoided the Israeli attacks on Gaza.

"We talked to them and we told them 'please, we ask you, do not end the truce. Let the truce continue and not stop' so that we could have avoided what happened," he said in Cairo.

The TV images of dead and wounded Gazans has inflamed Arab public opinion, and protests erupted in Arab Israeli villages, the West Bank and elsewhere in the Arab world.

The campaign embarrassed moderate Arab regimes that have encouraged Israeli-Palestinian peacemaking and weakened Hamas' rival, Abbas, who has ruled only the West Bank since Hamas violently seized control of Gaza in June 2007.

Abbas condemned the attacks on Saturday, but fearing violence could spiral out of control, his forces also broke up protests in the West Bank.

Israeli killed as barrage of rockets pound west Negev

By AMOS HAREL
AND YANIR YAGNA

ASHKELON — One Israeli was killed and fourteen others were wounded by a Palestinian Grad missile, which exploded near a construction site in the coastal town of Ashkelon.

Most of the victims were construction workers from the Galilee village of Manda and the Bedouin town of Rahat. Five were considered in serious condition, four sustained moderate wounds, and five suffered light injuries.

The man who was killed was named as 27-year-old construction worker Hani al Mahdi, from the Bedouin village of Aroer.

Curious onlookers gathered at the scene despite the Home Front Command's directive to avoid loitering in groups outdoors.

At least 40 rockets have been fired into Israel since Monday morning – nine of which hit Ashkelon, five struck Sderot and four others which struck various towns in the western Negev. One home in Sderot sustained a direct hit. Channel 2 reported that the residents of the home have been treated for shock.

"I'm standing next to the body," Ashkelon Mayor Benny Vaknin told Israel Radio by telephone, on the third day of an Israeli air offensive in the Gaza Strip. "To my great regret, we have a fatality. He was killed."

Sirens wailed intermittently on Monday morning in Ashkelon as television crews captured footage of panicked residents seeking cover from the incoming projectiles.

On Sunday, Gaza-based Palestinians launched a barrage of at least 40 rockets at the western Negev as the Israel Air Force continued to bomb targets in the Strip.

Also on Sunday, two Katyusha rockets, with a diameter of 122 mm, exploded near Ashdod. More than 30 kilometers from Gaza, this was the deepest into Israel a Palestinian rocket has yet to strike.

The Katyushas, which are the most improved versions of the Palestinian rockets, have a range of up to 40 kilometers. The particular rockets that struck on Sunday travelled 37 and 35 kilometers.

UN calls for immediate halt to violence

By NATASHA MOZGOVAYA
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspapers Ltd.

UNITED NATIONS — The United Nations Security Council called early on Sunday for an immediate end to all violence in Gaza.

The UN issued the statement after the death toll climbed past 270 on the second day of Israeli air strikes in the Gaza Strip in retaliation for rocket and mortar fire into Israel by Gaza militants.

The statement, agreed upon after four hours of closed-door council discussions, called on all parties to address "the serious humanitarian and economic needs in Gaza."

It urged them to take necessary measures to ensure Gaza's people were supplied with food, fuel and medical treatment.

Security Council members "stressed the need for the restoration of calm in full" – a reference to a six-month ceasefire ended by Hamas on Dec. 19 – to open the way for a Palestinian-Israeli political solution.

Diplomats from several countries said they preferred the cautiously worded statement on which all 15 council members could agree, to a public debate in which they would have clashed angrily over who was to blame for the Gaza violence.

"We have had over the years many occasions when we had long meetings of the Security Council, strong statements were made and they did not affect anything," Russian ambassador Vitaly Churkin said. "Our hope and our expectation is that this modest... press statement is going to have an impact."

But within minutes of the statement being issued, diplomats gave conflicting interpretations of it.

Palestinian ambassador Riyad Mansour said it was clearly aimed at Israel. He told reporters that Palestinians would now be waiting to see if Israel stopped its "aggression."

If Israel did not do so within 24 or 48 hours, he said, "We, the Arab nations and our friends... will come back knocking on the door of the Security Council in order to bring Israel into compliance."

But U.S. ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad said the "way forward" was for the Gaza militants to stop rocket attacks on Israel.

"Clearly in that context Israel has the right of self-defence, and nothing in this press statement should be read as anything but that," he told journalists.

Israeli ambassador Gabriela Shalev said Israel would "wait and see if Hamas is really going to abide by the... statement of the Security Council and we'll draw the conclusions," but did not make clear whether Israel would halt its offensive.

Israel "did not think it was so urgent for the Security Council, after not being involved in the situation for such a long time, to rush and call for the end of an operation which is taking place in order to protect our citizens," she said.

The UN held emergency consultations Saturday night and early Sunday on the Israeli bombings in Hamas-ruled Gaza and debated whether to adopt a statement urging Israel to halt its military operations without delay.

Libya, on behalf of the Arab group of nations at the UN, called the late-night council meeting, after Israeli warplanes rained more than 100 tons of bombs on security sites in Gaza on Saturday and early Sunday.

Ban Ki-Moon

"There is no justification for this whatsoever," Mansour, the Palestinian ambassador, told reporters before the council began its closed-door consultations. "This collective punishment is inhumane, immoral and should be stopped immediately.

"There is no justification for punishing 1.5 million Palestinians in Gaza because of the actions of a few. The Security Council should demand that this be stopped immediately."

Libyan diplomats were pressing for an open council meeting and adoption of a presidential statement. But there appeared to be reluctance among some members to hold an open meeting because of concerns of inflaming the situation.

Instead, Russia circulated a proposed press statement, which is less important than a presidential statement because it does not become part of the council's official record, but still reflects the views of the UN's most powerful body.

The Russian draft expresses serious concern at the escalation of the situation in Gaza, stresses the need for the restoration of calm, and calls for an immediate opening of the border crossings into Gaza and for an unrestricted humanitarian access in the area, including supplies of food, fuel and provision of medical treatment.

Defence Minister Ehud Barak on Sunday did permit the borders to be partially opened to let in medical supply and basic humanitarian aid, Israel Radio reported.

The Arabs proposed a number of amendments to the Russian text, including urging Israel to halt its military operations immediately, stressing the numerous Palestinian deaths, especially among civilians as well as the destruction of property.

Earlier Saturday, UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon expressed deep alarm at the violence and bloodshed in Gaza and condemned Israel's excessive use of force leading to the death and injury of civilians.

He also expressed deep alarm at the continuing rocket attacks by Palestinian militants in southern Israel and expressed deep distress that repeated calls on Hamas for these attacks to end have gone unheeded, UN deputy spokesperson Marie Okabe said.

"He appeals for an immediate halt to all violence," she said.

The UN said Ban made calls about the escalating violence to U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak and Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni, the presidents of Egypt and Turkey, the foreign ministers of Russia and Britain, the head of the Arab League and the European Union's foreign policy chief.

The Arab League also scheduled an emergency meeting late Saturday to discuss the situation in Gaza.

The United States, Israel's closest ally, blamed Hamas for the situation.

"These people are nothing but thugs, so Israel is going to defend its people against terrorists like Hamas that indiscriminately kill their own people," White House spokesperson Gordon Johndroe said.

Rice on Saturday said that the United States holds Hamas responsible for the renewal of violence in the Gaza Strip. Nearly 300 Palestinians and one Israeli have been killed since the fighting began on Saturday morning,

Rice briefed president-elect Barack Obama on the situation in Gaza. President George W. Bush has spoken to regional leaders and the administration will remain in close contact, the White House said in a statement.

Australia's Deputy Prime Minister Julia Gillard also blamed Hamas for the breakdown in calm.

Meanwhile, the Chinese Foreign Ministry issued a statement denouncing the violence and calling on both sides to show restraint. Indonesia accused Israel of breaching the terms of the Annapolis accord drafted in late 2007 and called on it to cease attacking Gaza.

Protesters take to the streets

JTA

Thousands of demonstrators took to the streets in Arab and European countries to protest Israel's operation in Gaza.

Rallies condemning Israel's operation in Gaza were held Sunday in countries including Egypt, Iraq, Jordan, Lebanon, Syria, Yemen and the United Arab Emirates, as well as in London. In Mosul, Iraq, a suicide bomber blew himself up in a crowd of more than 1,000 demonstrators.

More than 50,000 protested in cities throughout Egypt, according to the BBC. Demonstrators in Dubai protested in front of the Palestinian consulate.

Police in London arrested three protesters Sunday after a demonstration outside the Israeli Embassy turned violent as a small group of demonstrators attempted to break into the private road where the embassy is located. At least three people were arrested on suspicion of public order offences after riot police were called in to restore order.

Another demonstration was planned for Monday.

Gaza used as terrorist haven for Hamas, says Barak

Barak told the assembled lawmakers that the defence establishment spent months preparing for the Gaza operation.

Likud party leader Benjamin Netanyahu criticized the Arab protests while calling on Prime Minister Ehud Olmert to dismiss minister Raleb Majadele, the lone Arab serving in the cabinet.

Arab Knesset members repeatedly accused the government of waging a war for electioneering purposes and accused the defence minister of intentionally killing children.

Russian-Israeli MK Avigdor Lieberman said that the Arab lawmakers ought to relocate to Gaza and not return. The Arab MKs replied by calling him a "fascist" and insisted that he should return to the country where he came from.

"There are those who are counting bodies and at the same time counting Knesset seats," Israeli Arab MK Ahmed Tibi said. "Bodies for votes – this is done primarily by the Labor party."

Israeli Arab MK Mohammed Barakeh said, "There are those who are profiting from Palestinian blood in order to get elected."

Barakeh and MK Taleb a-Sana were subsequently evicted from the plenum.

Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni lashed out at Hamas, imploring foreign leaders to not judge Israel solely on the images broadcast on television screens.

"Israel is acting against Hamas and not against the population," Livni said. "We are once again making clear that whoever has complaints over the state of the population [in Gaza] should take them to those who have responsibility over the situation there – Hamas."

Livni made reference to Hani al-Mahdi, a 27-year-old man from Ar'ur who was killed by a Palestinian rocket in Ashkelon on Dec. 29.

"A state must defend all of its citizens," she said. "I heard on the way here that Hamas announced that the man killed by the rocket in Ashkelon was one of the Zionists, even though he is an Israeli Arab. They do not make this distinction."

Israel Briefs

Separation fence

Israel must complete construction of the West Bank separation fence surrounding Jerusalem by 2010, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said.

Of the 490-mile-long network of fences and walls Israel is building in and along the occupied West Bank, one-fifth runs around Jerusalem, including key eastern parts of the Holy City, where Palestinians want a capital for future statehood.

More than two-thirds of the Jerusalem barrier is finished, the statement said. Of the outstanding sections, 4.5 kilometres (one mile) have been held up by legal challenges, filed for Palestinian residents who fear losing access to farmland or city services.

Bush crash inquiry

Israel's Transportation Ministry will set up its own inquiry committee into last month's bus crash near Eilat, which killed 24 people and wounded dozens more.

The committee will not be established until after the police have finished the initial phase of their investigation, and the ministry has not yet decided who will sit on it. However, the ministry believes its own inquiry is important to examine problems that it might need to address, such as poor infrastructure or excessively high speed limits.

The crash occurred when the bus driver lost control as he was trying to pass on a dangerous curve. The bus smashed through the road barrier and tumbled over a cliff.

The police think the driver was probably obeying the speed limit, but claim this limit is too high for Route 12's dangerous conditions.

Pay raise waived

Due to the difficult economic times, Israel's Knesset members will waive a 2009 pay raise.

The Knesset House committee decided that lawmakers would give up an automatic three per cent pay raise in January, according to reports. Knesset members earn about $8,300 a month and receive raises tied to the retail price index four times a year. They also get the use of a car.

Elections

Israeli voters will be able to ask candidates for national elections questions via YouTube.

The initiative, spearheaded by Israel's Channel 2, is similar to interactive initiatives from the U.S. presidential campaign.

Internet users can upload a 25-second video with a question for a candidate.

Some entrants will be invited to participate in Channel 2's live interview with the candidates for prime minister.

$300M for startup

A major American medical technology company purchased an Israeli startup for $300 million.

St. Jude Medical, which serves doctors and patients in more than 100 countries, purchased MediGuide, which has developed technology and products for procedures that are minimally invasive.

MediGuide was founded in 2000 after spinning off from Elbit Systems, an Israel-based global defence electronic company.

Toledo cemetery

The Spanish government has ordered a freeze on a building project in a medieval Jewish cemetery in Toledo.

More than 100 graves have been exhumed from the building site, an expansion of a nearby state school, according to Rabbi Abraham Ginsburg, executive director of the Committee for the Preservation of Jewish Cemeteries in Europe. Toledo regional authorities are currently storing more than 100 skeletons in separate boxes.

Madoff scandal reaches into Canada

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The financial scandal that has rocked American Jewish charities has also claimed a Canadian victim – though not to the extent felt in the United States.

The Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto took a $486,000 (Cdn) hit as a result of an investment that was indirectly linked to alleged fraudster Bernard Madoff.

"Although any loss is regrettable, and we are by no means minimizing its significance, our exposure is very small compared to other individuals and organizations," said Howard English, vice-president of corporate communications for UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. "On any given day, considering the size of Jewish Foundation assets and the amount that we invest, market fluctuations of $486,000 either up or down, would not be unusual. In other words, when market conditions are good, we can just as easily make $486,000."

The nearly half a million dollars referred to by English is the income that would be generated by a $5.4 million (Cdn) investment in a fund of funds, which included an investment vehicle managed by Madoff. A fund of funds invests in a basket of other investment funds rather than directly purchasing stocks, bonds or other securities. One of the funds was run by Madoff, a financial guru who managed massive amounts of money invested with him by many American Jews and Jewish charities.

Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto takes $486,000 hit

Madoff reportedly lost $50 billion US in what prosecutors claim was a giant Ponzi scheme that relied on new investments to provide substantial and stable returns to earlier investors. Among the biggest losers are Yeshiva University ($110 million US), Hadassah, the Women's Zionist Organization of America ($90 million US), the Chais Family Foundation, which funds Jewish higher education in Russia ($178 million US), as well as a foundation run by Elie Wiesel to benefit Ethiopians in Israel. The Robert I. Lappin Charitable Foundation, which provides money for Jewish day schools and camps and funds trips to Israel, announced it was closing after losing more than $7 million managed by Madoff.

The Forward, a New York-based Jewish newspaper, reported that 24 Jewish charities lost large amounts invested with Madoff.

English said returns from the fund of funds connected to Madoff generated "steady returns for 12 years without problems." With about $200 million (Cdn) in total assets, the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto relies on professional money managers to determine investments, plus the input of a lay investment committee. The expected half-million-dollar loss is only .26 per cent of the foundation's total assets.

English said the foundation's investment experts aren't prepared to write off the $5.4 million investment that produced the $486,000 return.

"We believe the $5 million is recoverable. We hired an investment consultant who is looking into it, and he believes there is a good chance it is recoverable," he said.

Furthermore, English continued, "the amount in question did not belong to any one donor, nor will it adversely affect any one beneficiary agency. It has no impact whatsoever on disbursements to agencies from the UJA Federation annual campaign."

In Montreal, meanwhile, Richard Kleinman, executive director of the Jewish Community Foundation of Montreal, said, "We had no connection to Madoff… We have checked around Montreal and, to our knowledge, no one is tied to the Madoff scandal."

The foundation's assets have dropped to $250 million from $300 million, but that is due to market forces unconnected to Madoff, Kleinman added.

One Montreal-based organization, Canadian Hadassah WIZO, announced it had no connection with Hadassah in the United States, which lost millions. "We don't do joint investments," said Alina Ianson, executive director of Canadian Hadassah WIZO. The Canadian organization is a separate legal entity, and even memberships are not reciprocal.

"We are not involved with Madoff in any way, shape or form," she stressed.

In Toronto, Avi Benlolo, president and CEO of the Canadian Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center, said they "have not been affected [by the Madoff scandal] thankfully," while Steve Rabinowitz, a spokesperson for Taglit-Birthright Israel in both Canada and the United States, dismissed reports the organization was affected by the financial fraud.

"Bernard Madoff was not a donor to Taglit-Birthright Israel nor to its foundation, and since the foundation uses all available funds for Taglit trips, they have no funds to speak of to place under investment.

"No donors to the program have reported that they are affected by the situation, either. Therefore, Birthright is essentially unaffected by the scandal. But because of reports that the Robert I. Lappin Foundation… has discontinued its programs and terminated all of its staff due to investments with Madoff's securities fund and because of speculation about the finances of Birthright's largest funders, Dr. Miriam and Sheldon Adelson – unrelated to the Madoff scheme – there has been confusion, and also incorrect rumours, about the health of Taglit-Birthright Israel.

"Birthright Israel has announced that they will take all participants who were accepted to 2008-2009 winter trips, are determined to meet all 2009 goals, and just raised over $2 million US at their gala dinner in New York.

"Taglit-Birthright was completely unaffected by Bernie Madoff," he said.

Car runs people over at Chanukah party

JTA

NEW YORK — Fourteen people, including six children, were injured Dec. 25 when a car crashed into a storefront in Woodmere, N.Y., where a Chanukah celebration was taking place.

Nassau County police say that a driver lost control of his car, crashing through the building's windows and knocking people over inside, according to The Associated Press. Police have not yet released the name of the driver, but Newsday reported that the car was registered to Theodore Saretsky, 76, a psychologist with no record of accidents or violations. No charges had been filed as of Friday morning.

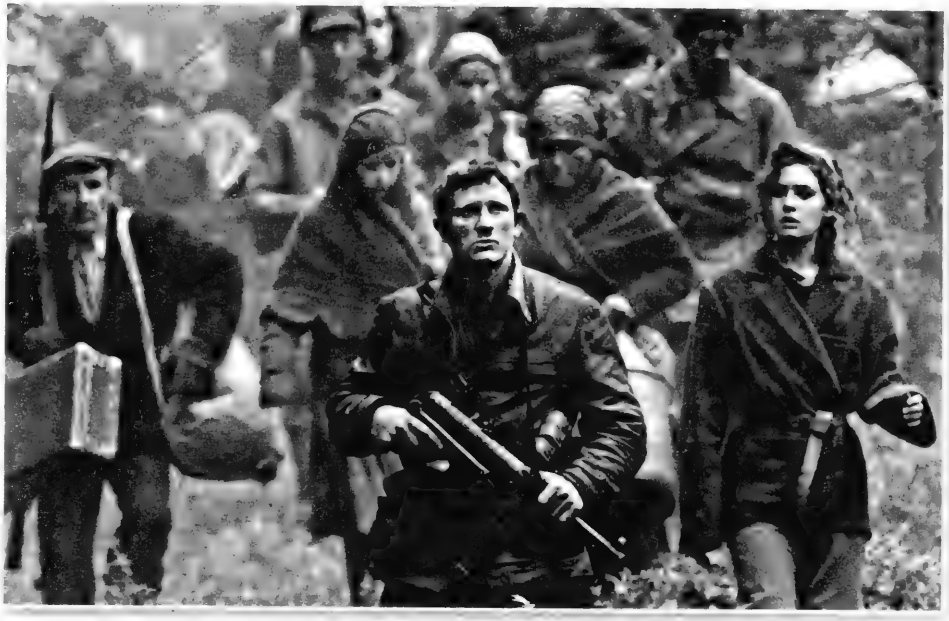
AP reported that four people, including two of the children, were hospitalized in serious condition, and an 8-year-old and 4-year-old are in stable condition. Between 100 and 150 people were attending the party, sponsored by Chabad of Five Towns

It took about 30 people to lift the BMW sport utility vehicle off a man who was trapped under the front tire, Newsday reported, quoting Leo Shalamoff, owner of Pizza Pious, a kosher restaurant across the street.

"We saw the man under the car. It was terrible. It was difficult. There was maybe 30 men picking up the car but suddenly we did it. We pulled him out and helped him to the ambulance," Shalamoff was quoted as saying. "There was blood all over."

Defiance tells of brothers' struggle against the Nazis

By BONNIE LAUFER
Special to The CJN



Daniel Craig sheds his Bond outfit for that of a Jewish resistance fighter in Defiance.

There aren't many well-known stories from World War II about Jewish resistance-fighters, but a new movie opening next month focuses on three brothers who had the incredible will and determination to live during a time that didn't give Jews much hope.

Defiance, based on Nechama Tec's non-fiction book of the same name, is directed by Edward Zwick (Blood Diamond) and stars Daniel Craig, Jamie Bell and Liev Schreiber as Jewish brothers who flee Nazi-occupied Poland and build a makeshift village alongside Russian resistance-fighters.

The year is 1941, and the Jews of eastern Europe are being massacred by the thousands. Managing to escape death, the three brothers take refuge in the dense surrounding woods they have known since they were children. There the brothers begin their fight against the Nazis and turn a primitive struggle to survive into a way to avenge the deaths of their loved ones by saving thousands of others.

At first it is all they can do to stay alive. But gradually, as whispers of their plan spreads, they begin to attract others – men and women, young and old – willing to risk everything for the sake of a moment's freedom.

All three Bielski Brothers are tough, but they're also different in many ways. Tuvia (Craig) is a reluctant leader, and his decisions are challenged by his brother, Zus (Schreiber), who worries that Tuvia's idealistic plans will doom them all. Asael (Bell) is the youngest and caught between his brothers' rivalry. As a brutal winter descends, they work to create a community, and to keep faith alive when all humanity appears to be lost.

Their struggle was their saviour. When the war was over, 1,200 people emerged from that forest anxious to start new and hopeful lives.

It took director Ed Zwick 10 years to get the brother's story made into a film.

"Once I read the book I swore I was going to get to make it someday," Zwick said during a recent interview in Los Angeles. "The story needed to be told, it just took a long time. We just never gave up."

Casting was of the utmost importance, and although Craig is best known as the latest James Bond, there was no question that Zwick wanted him to play the brother who ultimately became the leader of the forest camp.

"I think it's a statement of his artistic ambition," says Zwick of Craig's commitment to the film. "He was an independent working actor long before he became James Bond, and I think he's determined to remain one."

Schreiber, one of the few Jewish actors on set, was totally committed to the project and even learned to speak Russian for the role.

"For me, that was the way into the character," Schreiber said. "Zus, began and ended with Russian so there was something about learning that language that really helped motivate me."

Bell, who entertained audiences eight years ago in Billy Elliot, was challenged by his part in the movie and felt ashamed that he hadn't heard of the Bielski Brothers before getting the script.

"I thought that I had a pretty extensive knowledge of the Holocaust and the Second World War, but then I read the story, and I felt embarrassed that I didn't know this story and about Jewish resistance and resilience," Bell said. "Learning about this I felt like I desperately had to be a part of this project and the telling of these brothers' legacy."

The movie was shot on location in Lithuania, and it was important to Zwick and the cast to keep the conditions as bare bones as possible.

"It was freezing and damp," said Alexa Davalos, who plays Tuvia's love interest, Lilka. "We didn't have trailers, we worked out in the snow for hours and the food was kept to a minimum.

"We knew we could have never experienced what the Jews went through at the time, but the conditions kept things in perspective and helped us bond as a community. It was a very humbling experience."

For Schreiber, it was more than just a humbling experience. As the father of two young sons, the actor felt that making a film like this was an important way to keep the memories alive for his children.

"It's a huge part of my culture, both as a father and as a Jew to remember things and to keep that tradition of memory alive because it is such an essential part of my heritage. This is certainly a story from that episode of history that I hope they do remember, because it's such a triumphant one."

Defiance opens Jan. 16.

Toronto writer creates CBC fantasy drama Being Erica

By SHERRY SMITHER
Special to The CJN

Ever look back at your life and regret a decision you've made? What if you could change the past?

That's the premise behind writer/producer Jana Sinyor's new series, Being Erica, a one-hour drama about Erica Strange, a character who goes back in time and relives her past.

"Erica Strange is a Jewish girl in Toronto who's middle class, smart, pretty, popular in school. But when she hits her early 30s, her life isn't turning out the way she thought – her friends have great jobs, a lot of them are married and have children, and she's adrift. She's got the whole package, but for some reason she can't meet a great guy," Sinyor explained in an interview from her production office at Toronto Film Studios.

One day, Erica meets Dr. Tom, a mysterious therapist who offers to help her if she'll commit to therapy. Under his control, she goes back in time to recreate her past.

"She doesn't realize it, but his office exists everywhere," Sinyor said. "Erica can open any door, and Dr. Tom can decide to bring her in. Or she'll go through a door at work and be in his office. Doorways are a symbol in the show – she can cross a threshold and be in another time."

The show covers different periods of Erica's life, including the day she lost her virginity, the day of her bat mitzvah, and family events connected to holidays like Yom Kippur. Some episodes delve into what happens when someone you love marries someone you think is wrong for them.

Jana Sinyor

"There's a lot of pressure for women, once you're a certain age, to achieve certain things in your life – career-wise, marriage-wise and child-wise. If you don't hit those milestones, there can be the feeling of failure," said Sinyor, who, like Erica, is 30-something.

Sinyor is one of Canada's youngest and most accomplished television writer/producers. She is best known for co-creating YTV's Dark Oracle, which garnered her and fellow creator Heather Conkie the 2005 International Emmy in the best children's and youth category; and for writing several episodes of the popular Degrassi: The Next Generation.

"At the end of Dark Oracle, I went to different producers to see if they wanted to collaborate. When I met David Fortier and Ivan Schneeberg, co-presidents of Temple Street Productions, I immediately liked them. They are incredibly creative," she said.

Fortier and Schneeberg, who became executive producers of Being Erica, also produced Citytv's Canada's Next Top Model and CBC's How Do You Solve a Problem Like Maria?

"Getting my own show early in the game and being able to produce, write and learn all the aspects of production were invaluable," she said.

Sinyor and former Degrassi executive producer Aaron Martin oversee everything on Being Erica – wardrobe, art department, directors, casting, writing team and post-production for the show.

The cast includes Erin Karpluk (The L Word) as Erica, Michael Riley (This is Wonderland) as Dr. Tom, Kathleen Laskey (The Eleventh Hour) as Erica's mother and Reagan Pasternak (Just Buried) as Julianne.

"We all have things that we wish we could do differently and have ideas of what our life is supposed to be like. When things don't happen, we can think we're failing. Being Erica explores that experience."

The series premieres Jan. 5 at 9 p.m. on CBC Television. You can check out Erica Strange's blog at www.beingerica.ca.

Father and son team up

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

For the first time ever in Toronto, famed pianist Anton Kuerti will play in concert with his acclaimed maestro son, Julian.

The historic musical event, which is presented by Mooredale Concerts and will also feature the Hamilton Philharmonic Orchestra, will take place on Jan. 11 at the MacMillian Theatre.

"I always look forward to playing together with him," says Julian of his father, who is widely regarded as one of Canada's leading musicians.

"It's even more special that we get to do this in Toronto, our home town."

The father and son combo, along with the orchestra, will be performing works by Felix Mendelssohn, Bela Bartok and Beethoven's Symphony 8 in F.

"The first piece… by Béla Bartók is a wonderful and short portrait of five different aspects of village life in rural Hungary," explains Julian, who is into his second season as the assistant conductor of the renowned Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"The Piano Concerto No. 1 and the Capriccio Brillante (by Mendelssohn) both feature the piano as solo instrument, and are virtuosi and very exciting. The program ends with Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, which is perhaps his most 'classical' work in the symphonic medium."

Though this is their Toronto debut as a tandem, the Kuertis made quite a splash the last time they played together.

It was in March and Anton was supposed to be a member of the audience.

"[Julian] had a set of four concerts and this was the last and only one I was free to attend," recalls Anton.

"As I was taking a shower, two hours before concert time, the urgent phone call came in asking whether I would play."

The scheduled pianist had suddenly taken ill and concert organizers were in a bind.

Despite the extremely short notice and the fact he had not rehearsed with the orchestra, Anton filled in to the crowd's great surprise and pleasure.

"Father and son showed why some warhorses deserve their status – how, with enough intelligence and daring, even familiar music can seem new," praised the Boston Globe of the impromptu joint effort.

Austrian-born Anton began making headlines as early as age 11, when he played piano alongside the Boston Pops Orchestra.

His stellar reputation as a solo pianist is international in scope and he is also quite the recording machine, including recordings of all the Beethoven concertos and sonatas, as well as Schubert and Brahms concertos.

Earlier in 2008, Anton, who is presently artistic director of Mooredale Concerts, was bestowed with the well deserved Lifetime Artistic Achievement Award as part of the Governor General's Performing Arts Awards.

Julian, who is in his early 30s, trained as a violinist for most of his life and later made the switch to conducting.

His reputation is constantly on the rise and positive reviews are all the rage.

Mooredale Concerts will also be putting on its Music & Truffles children's series on Jan. 11, featuring a performance of The Snow Queen.

For tickets to either of these events, please phone 416-922-3714 ext. 103 or visit www.mooredaleconcerts.com.

Woman tracks down aunt's Holocaust diary

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Mariette Job

"Through her diary you can sense what kind of a person she was," said Mariette Job. "She was unforgettable, very intelligent, sensitive, strong. Altogether, an exceptional individual."

Job was talking about her late relative, Helene Berr, whose posthumous diary, The Journal of Helene Berr, was recently published in Canada by McClelland & Stewart after its publishing debut in France last year.

Berr, born in Paris in 1921, was a 21-year-old Jewish student of English literature at the Sorbonne when she started keeping a journal in April 1942, the second year of Germany's occupation of France. The scion of an assimilated family, she stopped writing seven months later, only to resume her entries in August 1943.

At regular intervals, Berr gave the pages of her diary to the family cook, Andree Bardiau, with instructions to pass them on to Berr's fiancé, Jean Morawiecki, if she was arrested by the Germans.

Morawiecki, who left Paris in the autumn of 1942 to join the French army in North Africa, obtained the diary in 1945, keeping it until Job tracked it down years later.

Job's mother, Denise, was Berr's older sister. Married in 1943 to François Job, Denise survived the German occupation, thanks to a Christian acquaintance who hid her. Mariette Job, her daughter, was born in 1950.

Berr and her parents, Raymond and Antoinette, were not as fortunate.

Raymond, the managing director of a chemical company, was arrested in June 1942 and interned in the Drancy transit camp outside Paris. Released several months later after a ransom was paid, he was rearrested in March 1944, along with his wife and daughter Helene.

Berr's parents perished in Auschwitz, while she died of typhus in Bergen-Belsen, only days before the camp was liberated by the Allies in April 1945.

In 1992, Job decided to look for the diary, a typed version of which she had read. "For me, it was an act of rebellion against silence," she said in an interview in Toronto in November.

Job deduced it might be in Morawiecki's possession, since Berr had dedicated it to him.

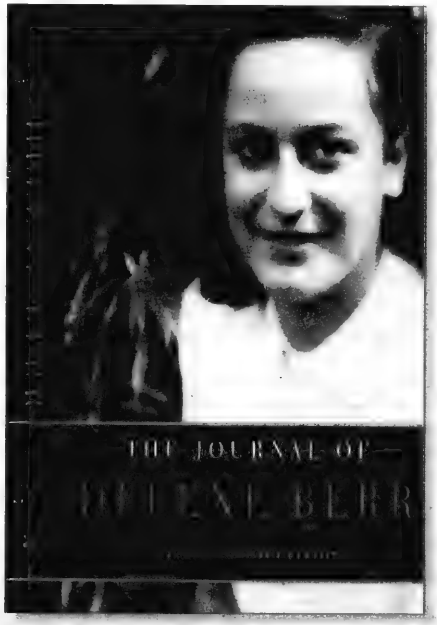
"When I met Jean, I just wanted to see and feel the diary," she said. "I had no intention of asking for it."

After several meetings, Morawiecki – who died this past November – offered Job the diary in 1994. "He wanted me to be its custodian and spiritual heir. I think he felt relieved to pass it on to me."

In an afterward in The Journal of Helene Berr titled A Stolen Life, Job writes, "What I had in my hands was a brown envelope containing a set of undamaged sheets from a student notepad. This long diary, whose form speaks of its author's personality, is handwritten in paragraphs, with almost no crossings out, without any revisions. The text is astonishingly clear. It flows without any retractions, in a single sweep, maintaining a perfect balance between thought and feeling."

Job donated the diary to the Memorial de la Shoah in Paris in 2002. Before it was first published, translation rights were sold in more than a dozen countries, including Israel.

"It was my idea to have it published," said Job, speaking through an interpreter. "Helene's diary is special. The story represents immortality. The Nazis could kill her body but not her soul."



Although comparisons have been made between The Journal of Helene Berr and The Diary of Anne Frank, Job believes they are facile.

"Helene was almost 10 years older than Anne. Hence, Helene's diary is more mature. Anne was shut off from the world in an attic. Helene was free to roam."

Drawing lessons from Berr's fate and France's complicity in the Holocaust, Job observed, "What happened was unthinkable, but the war showed that real assimilation had not taken place in France. Assimilation didn't work."

Anti-Semitism is deeply rooted in French society, she said, adding that while the French state has done a great deal to commemorate the Holocaust, France has yet to fully come to terms with it. Still, she was deeply moved by the sympathetic reception Berr's diary garnered in France.

She has nothing but contempt for Holocaust deniers and the lies they spread. "Nothing could be more horrible. It is as if the victims are being murdered again."

Yet Job evinces a silver lining. "Holocaust deniers have pushed historians to dig even deeper."

From Germany to Hollywood: Hear the heroic, often harrowing, tales of German artists in wartime Tinseltown in Cinema's Exiles: From Hitler to Hollywood, a two-hour documentary narrated by Sigourney Weaver.

The film recalls the experiences of the artists who fled to Hollywood after Hitler banned Jews from working in the German film industry. Some would change the face of American film by creating enduring classics such as Sunset Boulevard, The Bride of Frankenstein, The Adventures of Robin Hood, Ninotchka, Double Indemnity, High Noon, Some Like It Hot and Casablanca.

The film features the stories of actors Felix Bressart, Hedy Lamarr and Peter Lorre; directors Fritz Lang, Henry Koster, Billy Wilder and Fred Zinnemann; composers Frederick Hollander, Erich Wolfgang Korngold and Franz Waxman; and cinematographer Rudy Mate, among others. It premières on the American PBS television channel on Thursday, Jan. 1, 9:30 p.m.

Cellist mixes Old and New World sounds

By SHERRY SMITHER

When cellist Kristina Reiko Cooper moved to Israel from the United States, she found inspiration for her latest CD in her new land.

"Stone and Steel is an album inspired by Israel. It's based on very old tunes and very old songs, such as baroque and Renaissance music – even some Gregorian chants and Elizabethan songs that we've interpreted in a modern esthetic with classical roots," said Reiko Cooper over the phone from her home in Tel Aviv.

"When I converted and married my husband, [investment banker Leonard Rosen] we could have continued working in New York, but we wanted to live in Israel to get the full Jewish experience. It's different than converting and staying in New York… In Israel, we are experiencing it full throttle," she said.

Stone and Steel features Reiko Cooper on her 1786 William Forster cello, with piano and percussion accompaniment. The CD, which includes works by 17th-century composers Henry Purcell and John Dowland, has classical roots. The music, however, has been reworked with contemporary jazz arrangements by Kenji Bunch, who was heralded as "a composer to watch" by the New York Times, and award-winning composer and saxophonist Patrick Zimmerli.

Kristina Reiko Cooper

Born into a family of musicians – her father, Rex Cooper, is a pianist and professor at Pacific University in Oregon; her mother, Mutsuko Tatman, is a violinist with the Phoenix Opera and the Tucson Symphony; her grandfather was a composer, and her grandmother was an opera singer – it was natural for her to start playing piano at five. She then learned the violin and flute at 10.

The following year, during her father's sabbatical in Paris, the cello became the focus of Reiko Cooper's life.

"We found a cello teacher who was incredible, and I improved so much that my parents wanted me to stay on when my father's sabbatical ended," she said.

When her living arrangements with a Parisian family fell through, Reiko Cooper lived on her own, went to school and continued her music studies in Paris.

"I wouldn't recommend it to others, but when I was 12, I thought I was much older and more mature. I think I lived on baguettes and Nutella that year," she said, laughing.

With a doctorate from Juilliard School, Reiko Cooper is a visiting professor at Jerusalem's Hebrew University and the co-music director of the Israel Chamber Musjc Society. She plays with the eclectic trio Intersection and the contemporary music group Gontinuum.

Reiko Cooper has appeared all over the world and played with the Prague Chamber Orchestra, the Osaka Symphony and the Toronto Symphony Orchestra, among others.

Reiko Cooper and klezmer clarinettist Giora Feidman will première a double concerto, written for them by Georgian Israeli composer Yosef Bardanashvili, in Israel and New York next season.

Has the country inspired her to play Israeli music? "That's my next album. I'm already talking to different composers and arrangers. There will be the same grouping – piano and percussion, and maybe we'll add some ethnic instruments. I run into a lot of fine musicians in Israel," she said.

Reiko Cooper will perform in Toronto on March 20, in the lobby of the Classical 96.3 building at 550 Queen St. E. and on March 21 at the Glenn Gould Studio, opening for Quartetto Gelato.

Stone and Steel is available through the Linus Record website, Amazon.ca and iTunes. Reiko Cooper's website address is www.kristinareikocooper.com.

Stories told against backdrop of Israeli-Palestinian drama

By ELIAS LEVY
Staff Reporter

Cult figure – the French author of some 50 novels translated into 60 languages, and the winner of this year's Nobel Prize in Literature – was in Quebec City this fall as part of the international jury for the Five-Continent Literary Prize presented at the summit of La Francophonie.

The jury of 12 writers – chaired by Lise Bissonnette, chair of the National Library of Quebec – awarded this year's prize to Hubert Haddad, a Sephardi Jew of Tunisian origin, for his novel Palestine (Éditions Zulma).Haddad spoke about Palestine at a literary gathering at the Olivieri bookstore in Côte-des Neiges.

The novel tells the story of Cham, a young Israeli soldier with amnesia and no identification papers, who is taken in by a Palestinian family.

They think he is the sole survivor of a Palestinian commando squad. The blind mother, Asmahane, is the widow of a Palestinian political figure killed in an Israel Defence Forces ambush. Since the disappearance of her son, Nessim, she has been living alone with her daughter Falastin, a frail student. They decide to pass Cham off as Nessim.

The Israeli amnesiac thus comes to know the harsh conditions under which the Palestinians in the West Bank live, and the identity switch enables Haddad to show the similarities between the two enemy nations and to denounce the absurdity of the never-ending war between them.

Le Clézio said during the discussion that he was "seduced by the beauty and the power" of the novel.

"Palestine is a very strong book with a contemporary drama that resonates with everyone: the Israeli-Palestinian conflict," he said.

"What's amazing about Haddad's novel is that he doesn't take sides. The book doesn't give only one version of the facts. Rather, it brings to life from within the complications and complexities of the drama.

Le Clézio noted that the change of identity gives the novel "an element of the fantastical," but added that the Israeli-Palestinian drama is a political matter for which there is no foreseeable solution.

"It's a very serious question because it is costing many lives in both camps. Both Palestinians and Israelis have committed cruel and horrible acts… But, in my opinion, Haddad's novel brings hope. Putting yourself in the place of another may be the beginning of a solution – not a political one, but simply one that is human and philosophical."

Le Clézio said that for him, Haddad's novel goes to the heart of the problem, which has existed in Palestine for more than a century: "Two peoples who are almost brothers, two Semitic peoples who live in the same land and who must find a way to get along.

"But the only way for these two opposing peoples to get along is for one to walk in the other's shoes. There is no other alternative. Starting with a fantastical theme, Haddad brilliantly tackles a human and philosophical problem…"

In 1992, Le Clézio published Étoile errante, a beautifully written novel that combines two people's stories – that of Esther, a young Jewish woman who escapes from the Nazis during World War II and immigrates to Israel after the war, and that of Nejma, a young Palestinian refugee who leaves her country in 1948, when the State of Israel is founded.

The historic novel was not well-received in pro-Zionist Jewish circles, where Le Clézio was criticized for establishing a deceptive parallel between the unspeakable slaughter of the Holocaust and the exodus of the Palestinian people from their native land.

In 1988, Le Clézio published a novella in the militant Revue d'Études palestiniennes, in which he clearly showed his pro-Palestinian sympathies, thus arousing the anger of several Jewish intellectuals.

During the Francophonie meeting in Quebec, Le Clézio discussed his motivation in writing Étoile errante and expressed some personal opinions about the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

In the spring of 1943, a small village on the outskirts of Nice was transformed into a ghetto by Italian occupiers. A few weeks later, the Germans brought the entire Jewish population into the sealed-off area, Le Clézio said.

"My mother knew about this, but I was only a little boy. Years later, she spoke to me about it at some length. She also told me of events that are not discussed in history books. The Jews of that little village were savagely persecuted and then taken to a field and shot by the German army. I went to see that field. Then I wanted to write about this tragic story because it seemed to me that the Palestinian drama also had its roots far in the past.

"In fact, while traversing that dark field of memory, I realized that the death of those Jews shot in such a cowardly way by the Germans in that corner of Nice would in some way be a forerunner of everything that came after."

While writing Étoile errante, Le Clézio discovered "the extent of the drama of the Palestinian refugees" by reading journals from the time of the first Arab-Israeli war.

"I read about everything that happened in Palestine in 1947 and 1948. I learned how the Palestinian population was deported: the people on the roads… how people waited on the beach, not knowing where to go; the rumours that circulated about settling accounts, about massacres, about extortion… The result was that the Palestinian Arabs gradually fled. When I wrote Étoile errante, the first Palestinian intifadah was at its height. Since then, the situation in Palestine has deteriorated a great deal."

Le Clézio is quite pessimistic about the possibility of a settlement of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict any time soon.

"When I was writing Étoile errante, I thought that, sooner or later, there would be a political accord between the Israelis and the Palestinians, that Jerusalem would perhaps become a city under an international mandate – that is, a city that would be presented to the world as a model of coexistence and the possibility of reconciliation. It didn't happen. I don't know if it will ever happen… I am afraid that this perpetual conflict might become an all-out war that will go on until both peoples are virtually destroyed.

This is an abridged version of an article that appeared in French in the Montreal edition of The CJN. Translation by Carolan Halpern.

Award-winning novelist raised in Liverpool 'shtetl'

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Clothes are more important than you think, says British novelist Linda Grant, whose forthcoming novel, The Thoughtful Dresser, celebrates the pleasures of sartorial adornment.

In her view, clothes should be seen as the most personal, yet public expression of identity. "The idea that clothes are irrelevant in how a person is perceived is a denial in how reality works," observed Grant, who was in Toronto recently to attend the International Festival of Authors at Harbourfront.

An award-winning novelist who holds dual British and Canadian citizenship, she makes no secret of the fact that apparel gives her great pleasure and that she likes shopping. "There's never been a time when I wasn't interested in clothes," said Grant, whose wardrobe is more than merely modest.

Grant, who acquired Canadian citizenship after living in this country from 1976 to 1984, suggested that she learned the value and importance of clothes from her grandmother, an eastern European Jew who arrived in Britain in 1900. In a class-ridden society, she understood almost immediately that you can create a favourable impression on the basis of your appearance.

"There's been a lot of writing about clothes," said Grant, whose current novel, The Clothes on Their Back, is a story of survival that unfolds against the backdrop of 1970s London.

Writers from Geoffrey Chaucer to Marcel Proust have highlighted clothes in their respective works, she commented. "It's an element in serious fiction."

The Clothes on Their Back – which is about a sensitive, bookish Jewish girl who grows up sealed off from both the past and the present – was short-listed for the 2008 Man Booker Prize.

The award was won by Aravind Adiga for The White Tiger, but Grant claims she was not disappointed. "I went into it with no expectations of winning," she said in an interview. "I was very glad to be on the short list."

Grant – whose novel, When I Lived in Modern Times, was the winner of the 2000 Orange Prize for fiction – regards awards as a double-edged sword. "They raise your profile and give you greater sales. But the downside is that you have to spend a lot of time doing public relations, which takes away from your writing time."

Usually, Grant spends mornings writing and the rest of the day thinking. "Your mind is always running, escaping into your imagination."

Inspiration may be slow to surface. "Sometimes, you write all morning, only to throw it away. If it comes too easily, it doesn't mean it's good."

A former journalist on the staff of the Guardian, she wrote her first novel, The Cast Iron Shore, in 1996, three years after her first book, Sexing the Millennium: A Political History of the Sexual Revolution, appeared.

After The Cast Iron Shore, the novel of which she is most fond, she wrote Remind Me Who I Am, an account of her mother's decline into dementia and the role that memory plays in creating a family history.

Grant wrote When I Lived in Modern Times – a coming of age story of a woman coping with her identity and of a country struggling to be born – after completing an assignment on Israel's 50th anniversary for the Guardian.

Set in 1946, on the eve of the end of the British Mandate in Palestine, the novel's chief protagonist is a 20-year-old Jewish hairdresser who settles in Tel Aviv after finding the kibbutz unpalatable.

Grant was drawn to the topic for a number of reasons. "It was a very extraordinary time in the world," she explained. "The British empire was ending. Refugees were returning to their homes. New countries were coming into existence."

Grant was inspired to write it after wandering the streets of Tel Aviv and speaking to Israelis who lived through that momentous period.

It did not require much research. "I read back issues of the Palestine Post. I was looking for stuff that big history books don't reveal: the coverage of British football matches, ads for hairdressing salons, and the like."

Linda Grant

Grant's third novel, Still Here, a tale of two middle-aged people trying to come to terms with their respective pasts, was published two years after I Lived in Modern Times.

In 2006, her non-fiction work, On the Street: A Writer's View of Israel, for which she won the Lettre Ulysses Prize for Literary Reportage, was published.

She described it as a non-political account about Israel. "I wanted to get beyond words like 'Zionism' and 'Zionists.' I wanted to humanize the Arab-Israeli conflict."

Asked whether she considers herself a Zionist, Grant replied, "I came to the conclusion that it would be inconceivable not to support Israel's existence. It's a place with people, not just an idea."

She is less than confident that the Arab-Israeli dispute can be defused any time soon. "It will be very, very difficult to resolve. It would require very wise governments and political leaders in the Knesset, Ramallah and the White House. We don't have any of that, though I have hopes in [Israeli Foreign Minister] Tzipi Livni and [U.S. president-elect] Barack Obama."

Israel forms a component of Grant's secular Jewish identity. Born in Liverpool in 1951, she was raised in a traditional home where Yiddish was spoken and the laws of kashruth were taken seriously.

"Liverpool had a small but strong Jewish community that originated in eastern Europe," she recalled. "You knew everyone. It was like a shtetl. On the whole, everyone worked in the shmatte trade. It was a homogenous community that gave you a powerful identity and shaped your world. It had nothing to do with religion and politics."

Due to a serious recession in Britain, Grant went to Canada to complete her education. Having graduated with a BA degree in English from the University of York in Britain, she finished an MA at McMaster University in Hamilton. She did her post-graduate studies at Simon Fraser University in Vancouver.

After returning to Britain, Grant worked for the Guardian as a feature writer, reporting from, among other countries, the Czech Republic, Poland and Kosovo.

She enjoyed journalism, but seeking greater challenges, she turned her attention to to book writing. She had no trouble making the transition. As she put it, "You don't have to rely on facts, and you can make it up."

These days, Grant rarely dabbles in journalism. Yet she misses it. "It's enjoyable and gets you out of the house."

Winnipeg federation trains future leaders

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Twenty-four of this city's future Jewish leaders recently gathered at the Asper Jewish Community Campus to learn about the responsibilities of being members of a board.

This was the third in a series of monthly sessions for the young adults who are participating in Boardwalking, a new leadership training program of the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg that is being supported by the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba.

"Over the past few years, board membership in Jewish organizations have become more accessible to young adults in our community," said Judi Price-Rosen, the director of federation's Next Generation Initiatives.

"While this is an encouraging trend, it was apparent that these young leaders are not being given adequate training for their new roles… Boardwalking aims to cultivate a group of educated, informed and inspired young adults who will not simply 'sit' on boards, but will transform them.

"With fresh, innovative ideas and perspectives, Boardwalking graduates will not only enhance their sponsoring organizations, but also their leadership will strengthen the Winnipeg Jewish community as a whole," Price-Rosen said.

The year-long program kicked off in early October with a four-hour bus tour of the old Jewish sites of north Winnipeg. The tour was led by David Cohen, the former executive director of the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba.

"The tour was awesome," said young businessman Gavin Rich (of Richlu Manufacturing), who has recently joined the board of the Technion Society. "It gave us a real sense of our roots."

The second program – in early November – was facilitated by Michael Brooks, the executive director of the University of Michigan Hillel. He shared some ideas about how to create a more vibrant Jewish culture.

The teacher-facilitator for the Dec. 2 program was Debbie Stein, the director of learning and development of the Mandel Center for Leadership Excellence at United Jewish Communities (UJC). She is responsible for programs and services designed to educate and train professional and volunteer leadership for the federation system.

During her presentation, Stein gave her listeners recommendations that would make them more effective board members. "You need to understand your organization's mission and demonstrate a commitment to that mission," she said. "You need to keep informed about issues."

She encouraged her young listeners to share their views and ask questions at meetings, as well as recommending that they make sure their boards have insurance protecting members from liability and lawsuits.

"This [Boardwalking] is a wonderful program," said Steven Hyman, who is a member of the Rady Jewish Community Centre board. "It is nice to have a training program like this for those of us who are new to boards."

Carrie Ransby, who is on the board of B'nai Brith Camp, said, "It is great to see all of us younger people together here wanting to learn what is involved in being members of boards."

Stein said that she was "blown away by the calibre of the young people participating in the Boardwalking program.

"I was particularly impressed by the large number of men here. I have led a large number of similar programs throughout the United States and rarely are there any men participating."

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

It took an MVP performance from Amy Sherman to settle bragging rights as the two campuses of the The Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (TanenbaumCHAT) recently hooked up in the championship game of the 13th annual Israel Becker Tournament.

Sherman's 17 points led the Wallenberg campus to a 38-30 overtime victory over their northern Kimel foes in the basketball tournament final.

It was the third meeting in a week for the two teams. The Kimel girls won a round-robin meeting 49-38 earlier in the week and had defeated Wallenberg in overtime a few days earlier at the school's Alumni Cup tournament.

Both CHAT teams were joined by Gann Academy of Boston atop the standings with a 3-1 record following round-robin play. Wallenberg advanced to the championship game by knocking off the defending champions from Boston 26-23 in one semifinal, while Kimel moved on by beating Gray Academy from Winnipeg, 39-30, in the other final four matchup.

Laura Wilchesky joined Sherman on the first all-star team, along with Kimel's Elise Kovac.

Julia Kovac, Laura Elman and Maddy Venn-Mitchell of Wallenberg were second-team all-stars.

Ramaz, a New York school easily defended the boys title, defeating Toronto's Yeshivat Or Chaim 61-44 in the championship game. Ramaz won its six games in the event by an average of 21 points, with only Kimel staying within single digits of them, falling by nine.

Or Chaim was somewhat more competitive this year against the New Yorkers, having lost to them 69-20 in last year's semifinal. They advanced to this year's final, squeaking by Wallenberg, 38-37.

Mike Berg of Ramaz was named tournament MVP, while Or Chaim's Eli Herskovitz, Eden Kadish from Wallenberg, and Kimel's Cory Capland were first-team all-stars. Yonah Dorfman of Or Chaim was named to the second team.

Or Chaim's Akiva Maresky and Kimel's Sarah Edgerley won the tournament's sportsmanship awards.

The TanenbaumCHAT band and school mascot entertained those in attendance at the Kimel campus, while Rogers Cable 10 showed up on opening night and filmed a segment that aired the following day.

TanenbaumCHAT hopes to provide live audio streaming of tournament games next year.

The five-day event is held in memory of former TanenbaumCHAT student Israel Becker, who was killed in a car accident in 1994.

Players are housed around the Beth Avraham Yoseph Synagogue of Toronto and take part in programs to bond over Shabbat, while attending services and sharing meals.

"We talk about sports, leadership and Judaism," said Zev Steinfeld, a Jewish studies teacher and assistant basketball coach with the senior girls team at Kimel. "We broke them into small groups, which had kids from each team, so that they could get a chance to hang out and meet each other. I think they made a lot of friends and were able to take a lot away from the experience."

Who's got snowballs?

ALMOST FAMOUS

BY JACOB MEDJUCK

Hi Vancouver. How's your winter going? What's that? It snowed last week? How many inches? Two inches? That's a natural disaster. Close down city transit! (Often times, they do.)

This city is generally a coastal Shangri La. At least it was when I arrived in the '90s. But global warming wrecked everything. Tropical B.C. winters at 10 degrees celsius used to have me gloating. Now I wear a toque. And it's more than a fashion disappointment.

For eight years, it never snowed here. Then in 2006, the devil's white rain came down like a plague. At first, everyone was in awe, a town of snowflakes and flake-bedazzled idiots. But I wasn't fooled. Snow is only romantic when it's falling. After that, it becomes a chore – a wet, icy chore.

Having been an underage worker for years in winter's wet workforce, I wasn't festive when snow came to Vancouver. I was terrified.

I wasn't alone in my fear. I received a panicked call that winter from a B.C.-born babe who was driving down Oak Street and spinning out of control. She blurted, "How do I stop? How do I turn! I'll die out here tonight. We're all going to die tonight."

I looked outside. An inch of snow had fallen, and it was already starting to melt. I'd received the call because I was from the East Coast – the real East Coast, not Toronto. (P.S. 96 per cent of Vancouver-born residents think the East Coast is Toronto, that Montreal is it's own country, and that Newfoundland is a TV show. Also, in that universe, Halifax is part of Boston.)

The call came to me because Young Drivers of Nova Scotia requires its students to take a stunt-driving test on a frozen lake (at least it did when I was learning to drive), and I'd boasted about this fact since arriving here.

So I had to handle the careening vehicle. "Pump the breaks. Turn away from the spin," I offered, saving the day from my sofa.

Let me tell you what snow is – unless you live on the Prairies, in which case, you can tell me. (Even then, Winnipeg may beat the East Coast on cold, but snow? Tough call.) For the first half of my life, I lived in Halifax. For the last half, I've lived in Vancouver. Sandwiched in the middle were a few years in Ontario. (Even I thought Montreal was a separate country.)

I live in British Columbia now, and I love B.C. rain. The people in Vancouver who complain about the rain didn't have to shovel snow growing up. In Halifax, on the rare days that they didn't cancel school because of a snowfall, I often missed half my classes anyway plowed in at home, shovelling the walkway so we could get our car out of its winter ice cast.

In Moncton, we had to dig my Bubbi out of her house through a window, as if she lived in a two-storey igloo.

Snow, Vancouver, is not measured in inches or feet, but metres. Anything less is frost. Vancouver gets frost.

And traffic. We get traffic. For the 2010 Winter Olympics, we'll have no snow, but we will have athletes stuck in traffic on their way to events, only to find out when they arrive that we don't have the right temperature or precipitation levels to host winter sporting events. That will be hilarious, and it will highlight Canadians' renowned sense of humour.

How did we end up with the snowy side while the States scored desert? Whoever flipped that U.S.-Canada coin cheated – unless Hashem, in his infinite wisdom, is making up for time served in Sinai and this is some perverse reward.

Where's Lot's wife now, when my driveway needs traction?

I was just watching some birds fly south in customary V formation. That's all the GPS I need. Let's regroup in Vegas.

CRISPY CINNAMON GARBANZO BEANS

A great nut-free nosh!

- 1 c dried garbanzo beans
- 1/2 tsp ground cinnamon
- 1 tsp salt
- 2 tblsps vegetable oil
- 2 tblsp sugar

Soak beans overnight in cool water. Drain and pat them dry with paper towels. Preheat oven to 350°F. In a bowl, toss beans with the vegetable oil and sugar. Spread beans in a single layer on an ungreased baking sheet. Roast in oven until crunchy and no longer soft in centers, about 45 min. Stir a few times to prevent burning. Immediately toss beans in a bowl with cinnamon and salt. Cool and serve, or store in an airtight container at room temperature for up to a week.

Recommit to your plan in 2009

FITNESS CORNER

BY FELYCE ZOMPARELLI

Happy Anniversary! Can you believe it? It's been a year already since I started writing this column. I know that over the last year, you have become leaner, fitter, stronger and a little smarter when it comes to your health. Over the past 12 months, we've discussed how to get started on a workout regime; what you would need to get started at home; the importance of producing muscle mass, daily cardio, stretching after a workout, taking care of injuries, proper sleep and stress reduction, and, of course, the need for water while exercising. We've also talked about how to keep motivated and have fun, so that you can keep going and reach your goals.

What's next? Where do we go from here? I'm glad you asked that. First things first: you must re-evaluate your goals. Did you succeed? Did you fail? Why? The start of a new year is a great time to make new goals or revamp old ones. Make sure you're realistic, so that this year you'll not only reach your goals but surpass them.

Getting fit is a lifelong process, and it not only takes time, it also takes a plan. Once you have a plan, you need to put it into action. Once you've put that plan into action, you need to stick to it. Consistency is the name of the game.

This year, I'd like to help you understand how to intensify your workouts, as well as how to achieve the next level of fitness, how to safely get back into sports or fitness after injury, how daily cardio has lifelong benefits (beyond weight loss), and about how a positive attitude helps you more than you think.

How you look at food also plays a large role in your weight loss and fitness goals. We'll dive into that issue next month.

If you have questions or would like to learn more, e-mail me at felycesfitness@rogers.com.

L'ailah: it's OK

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

A friend of mine was going through days of deep sadness. I asked her if she would speak to me while she suffered, if she would loan her feelings and thoughts to a column. She agreed, recognizing that the interview would be cleansing for her, and that for readers, it would be a window into the mind of a stranger, of another human being.

My friend figured that giving others the chance to peer through the porthole of her feelings might ease other people's burdens. Her words remind us that we're not alone in our personal battles. Reading this is akin to learning about a biblical character such as Jacob, whose struggle with the angel taught us about facing existential angst.

We'll call my friend L'ailah. She is in her mid-30s and highly accomplished in her work counselling prisoners, many of whom are lifers. L'ailah is quite remarkable.

She told me, "Yes, lately I'm feeling sad, a general hopelessness, and it's compounded because there is the guilt of 'Why I can't get my s--t together. Why can't I be happy?'

"Everything feels like an effort. You know that feeling where the whole thing is so much work, even getting out of bed in the morning? How am I going to get through the next 40 years?"

L'ailah told me there are many people who love and support her, but nobody can make her feel better when she's depressed. That load is hers to carry.

"I worry about burdening other people with my sadness. My friends and family want to fix things, and when they can't, it makes them feel bad. For me, it's easier to pretend everything is OK.

"My sadness and despair sometimes make me feel as though I literally have a weight on my head pushing me down. I can't move. I will realize that I have been sitting perfectly still, staring at nothing for an hour or longer, as though I'm frozen."

I asked her what images and memories come to mind when she feels this way.

"Even when I was a kid, I remember feeling a lot of anxiety – you know that feeling, not knowing where you fit?

"I was an only child and spent a lot of time with my parents' friends. I wanted their approval. I remember watching adult behaviours and thinking if I could emulate them, I would be a successful human being. Other kids didn't know how to deal with me. I went on a school trip when I was 12 and someone thought I was the teacher. I never had friends my age. I wasn't an adult and I wasn't a kid."

L'ailah told me appearances meant "everything" to her mom. (L'ailah has a less complex relationship with her father, one that's very loving and less judgmental. She describes him as somewhat overbearing, but it's "more like a kitten licking you to death.")

"I was always well behaved. My mom delighted in telling me stories of how they would take me to restaurants and I never had tantrums. I was quiet, often invisible. This made her happy.

"A long time ago, I tried to kill myself. My mother said, 'What are people going to think of us?' I know my mother loves me, but I think she saw me as an extension of herself, and my sadness as a negative reflection of her parenting skills. She couldn't see me as my own person, separate from her."

We're not alone in our thoughts and feelings, or at least not as isolated as we think. The truth is, we are L'ailah. It's OK.

Invasion aims to destroy Hamas' terrorist infrastructure

By MARCY OSTER
JTA

KARNEI SHOMRON, West Bank — At least 50 Hamas terrorists have been killed since Israeli forces entered the Gaza Strip, beginning the long-anticipated ground phase of Operation Cast Lead.

An Israeli soldier died Sunday afternoon, several hours after being critically injured along with another soldier in a mortar attack near Jabalya. Four other soldiers suffered minor gunshot wounds Sunday night.

More than 30 Israeli soldiers have been injured, two seriously, since the ground invasion began Saturday night with a column of troops marching into northern Gaza following a day of heavy Israeli shelling near the border with artillery cannons.

The ground invasion began a week after the start of the Gaza operation, which until Saturday consisted of targeted air strikes on Hamas infrastructure, including rocket launchers, caches of weapons, weapons labs and training camps.

Operation Cast Lead was launched Dec. 27, after several days of intense Palestinian rocket fire on Israeli towns, following the expiration of a six-month ceasefire between Israel and Hamas.

At the opening of the weekly cabinet meeting Sunday, held at the Kirya army base in Tel Aviv in order to accommodate top army leaders, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert addressed the families of the Israeli soldiers who had been sent into battle less than 24 hours before.

Israeli troops make final preparations for their entry into Gaza on Saturday night.

"I have thought about you a lot since the operation began, especially since the decision about a ground operation approached," he said.

Pro-Israeli and pro-Palestinian demonstrators continued to turn out on the streets of the country's major urban centres over the weekend in response to Israel's new ground assault on Gaza, but the Harper government reiterated its support for the Jewish state's military operation.

Hundreds of pro-Palestinian demonstrators in Toronto, Ottawa, Montreal and elsewhere renewed calls for Israel to cease its military operation – dubbed "Cast Lead" by the Israel Defence Forces and which began with an Israeli Air Force bombing campaign on Dec. 27 – while pro-Israel counter-protesters, most of whom were organized by the Jewish Defence League (JDL) in Toronto, sought to bring Israel's reasons for the attack to the fore.

Despite the protests, on Sunday, Foreign Affairs Minister Lawrence Cannon issued a statement regarding Canada's position on the conflict.

It expressed concern over the "increase in hostilities" and urged renewed diplomatic efforts to ensure a "sustainable and durable ceasefire, starting with the halting of all rocket attacks on Israel. Canada maintains that the rocket attacks are the cause of this crisis."

In Toronto, close to 1,000 protesters gathered in the downtown core and marched from Dundas Square to the front of the Israeli consulate on Bloor Street.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Matas Named To OC

WINNIPEG — Winnipeg lawyer David Matas has been appointed a member of the Order of Canada, the country's highest civilian honour. Matas was recognized for his contributions to human rights legislation as well as to immigration and refugee law. He was one of 42 new appointees to the Order. Peter Munk was promoted within the Order to companion from officer for his contributions as an entrepreneur and philanthropist, and Paul Garfinkel was promoted to officer from member for his contributions in the field of mental health.

Halt Hostilities

TORONTO — Canadian Friends of Peace Now called upon Israel and Hamas to halt hostilities and begin indirect negotiations to renew their expired six-month ceasefire in order to avoid further civilian deaths on both sides of the Gaza border.

WORLD

On Guard

WASHINGTON — A group co-ordinating security for American Jewish institutions urged member organizations to review their security procedures in the wake of Israel's operation in Gaza. The Secure Community Network sent a memo to its dozens of member organizations, including Jewish federations around the country, advising them to take a close look at their security infrastructure, keep in close touch with local law enforcement officials and be aware of possible demonstrations in their area.

Hate Crime

WASHINGTON — A Molotov cocktail was thrown at Temple Sholom of Chicago, causing a small fire in a fenced-in playground. No one was hurt in the firebomb attack. The incident is being investigated as a hate crime.

Doves Speak

WASHINGTON — Four dovish pro-Israel groups criticized Israel's air strikes in Gaza and called for U.S. efforts to end the violence. J Street, Americans for Peace Now, Brit Tzedek v'Shalom and Israel Policy Forum all defended Israel's right to strike Hamas installations in Gaza, but said such actions would be counterproductive and damage Israel's security in the long run. They all also called for renewal of a ceasefire between Israel and Hamas.

Tough Talk

PRAGUE — The Czech Republic, which took over the European Union's presidency from France on Jan. 1, defended Israel's strikes against Hamas. The EU has called for a ceasefire to end the violence, but Czech Foreign Minister Karel Schwarzenberg, blaming Hamas for escalating the conflict after a ceasefire ended Dec. 19, said Israel had the right to defend itself. Schwarzenberg said Hamas had excluded itself from serious political debate as a result of its rocket attacks on Israel and he criticized the group for putting its bases and gun warehouses in densely populated areas.

Pot Calls Kettle Black

TEHRAN — Iran has set up a court in Tehran to try Israelis for "genocide against humanity" committed in Gaza. Israelis can be tried in absentia in the court, which was set up on the basis of a 1948 UN convention on the prevention of genocide to which Iran is a signatory, an Iranian judiciary spokesman said, Reuters reported. Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said his country would ask the International Criminal Court to try Israeli leaders for war crimes.

Pinter Dies

LONDON — Harold Pinter, a Nobel Prize-winning British playwright, has died at the age of 78. Pinter was called "the foremost representative of British drama in the second half of the 20th century" by the committee that awarded him the Nobel Prize for Literature in 2005. The son of a Jewish tailor of Hungarian descent, Pinter was born in East London. He began his career as an actor and later became a playwright and screenwriter. His well-known plays include The Birthday Party and No Man's Land, while his movie credits include The Quiller Memorandum and The French Lieutenant's Woman. Pinter was a vociferous critic of the war in Iraq, using his prerecorded Nobel lecture to denounce U.S. President George W. Bush and then-British Prime Minister Tony Blair.

Holocaust Memoir Release Cancelled

WASHINGTON — A New York publisher has cancelled the release of a Holocaust memoir after learning the core of the story was fabricated. Berkley Books, a division of Penguin Group, also demanded that Herman Rosenblat return his advance.

Rosenblat claimed a woman he met on a blind date in New York 12 years after World War II and later married was the same person who, as a Jewish child in hiding during the Holocaust, disguised herself as a Christian farm girl and tossed apples to him over the fence of a sub-camp of Buchenwald. While Rosenblat was interred at the Schlieben concentration camp, his wife did not toss apples to him, a scholar discovered.

"I wanted to bring happiness to people, to remind them not to hate, but to love and tolerate all people," he wrote in a statement published in the New York Times. "I brought good feelings to a lot of people and I brought hope to many. My motivation was to make good in this world. In my dreams, Roma will always throw me an apple, but I now know it is only a dream."

Awareness, funding needed to fight mental illnesses

Part 2 of this three-part series appeared in The CJN Jan. 1. It examined the limited number of Jewish resources available for patients with mental health difficulties and the pressure felt by the few Jewish organizations in the Greater Toronto Area, which are overwhelmed by the demand for services.

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Special Report
Part 3 of 3

Sufficient funding to enable Jewish agencies to address the needs of people in the community who have mental illnesses is crucial, said Jack Kugelmass, a social worker in the Jewish community.

"We really need to educate our community like any other community about mental illness," he said.

"John," who spoke to The CJN on the condition of anonymity about his frustrations concerning his Holocaust survivor parents who have been caring for his schizophrenic adult brother for his entire life, pointed to the way JACS (Jewish alcoholics, chemically dependent persons and significant-others) created a campaign that broke down the misconceptions that Jews don't suffer from addiction. John said a similar campaign to enlighten people about the existence of mental illness among Jews is also needed.

"We need a campaign to say that there are people who suffer within the community and [present] what resources are available – if there are any," John said.

"I think that if the parents and families themselves would meet others and share experiences, they would benefit from that. They would know that they are not suffering alone."

Devora Schwartz Waxman, the Family Caregiver Connections co-ordinator at Circle of Care, a non-profit provider of in-home health and support services said, "When caregivers call me and they need respite, they need a break. It would be great if I could suggest a place within the Jewish community where their kids could go."

Rochelle Goldman-Brown

Rochelle Goldman-Brown, the director of Chai Tikvah Foundation, which runs a kosher group home in the city, said there have been support groups for family members for years, but only for family members of clients.

"I think somewhere down the road we're going to look at expanding that to people in the community at large. People often feel very alone with this. It's just a way for people to get together with others who suffer from the same problem," Goldman-Brown said.

She added that they have also begun to write letters to rabbis of the congregations in the GTA asking them to speak about the issue from the pulpit and to include information about mental health issues in their bulletins.

"We need to think of ways to link families together, to create opportunities for people who are fairly high functioning and living at home to have broader social outlets within the Jewish community," Kugelmass said.

"I'm talking about programming specific to the needs of young Jewish men and women who are tied to Jewish values. It needs to be discussed in our institutions and they should ask themselves, 'How can we give them a voice?'"

"Rachel," who also spoke to The CJN on condition of anonymity to protect the identity of her schizophrenic son who is a Chai Tikvah resident, said the Jewish community simply hasn't done enough to address the issue.

Free, but unhelpful advice

From the editor's desk...

Nothing stirs newspaper editors in their opinion-offering roles more excitedly than Israel's conflict with the Palestinians. In a time of war of course, such as this, when Israel actually fights back, striking hard blows at the enemy, the editors' collective excitement transmutes to a kind of frenzied group zeal.

This phenomenon has been much on display in daily newspapers around the world.

But much of the material, analysis, and opinion that editors have chosen to feature on the editorial and commentary pages have been, like most free advice, off-the-mark and unhelpful.

Last Saturday's Globe and Mail, to take but one newspaper example, published two large commentaries on Israel's incursion into Gaza that were not only unhelpful, but also contradictory.

Patrick Martin, the paper's Israel-based bureau chief, wrote, ostensibly, a mini-primer about Hamas. The piece was entitled "The Islamic movement that just won't die."

It was decidedly not a paean of tribute to the terrorist organization, but nor was it even a slightly serious look at the genocidal mission of the organization or at the murderous nature of its related activities.

For example, Martin quotes one of his interviewees at a mosque in Hebron as saying that "Hamas will adapt to circumstances." To prove the point, Martin provides the following history.

"They have in the past. About 2005-06, for example, it dawned on Hamas leaders that the group's suicide-bombing campaign was not winning them international support and they largely dropped it as a tactic, replacing it with other tactics such as rocket attacks."

To be fair, Martin was writing about Hamas' sense of pragmatism, not about its sense of Jew-destroying purpose.

But to glide past the suicide bombing and the rocket attacks as merely "tactics" in the fight against Israel is to perpetuate misconceptions about the nature of Hamas, about its conflict with Israel and about this latest fighting in particular.

At an earlier point in his essay, Martin wrote, "For 21 years, Hamas has endured imprisonment, assassinations, expulsion, boycott and siege, and it has grown in strength through it all. It has practised rock-throwing, drive-by shooting, kidnapping, suicide bombing and, most recently, rocket attacks."

Casually; with the equivalent of an editorial shrug of the shoulder, Martin simply rolls out the list of Hamas activities as one would roll out a list of activities for members of a local Kiwanis club.

His failure to spell out the ultimate truth of these activities – that they are blatant, deliberate, calculated acts of terror aimed solely and exclusively at harming, maiming and killing the Jews of Israel – is a profound, intellectually damaging, omission from his analysis.

Two pages later, in the same issue of the Globe and Mail, there was another large essay on the current situation titled "Pathless in Gaza." Written by Michael Bell, Canada's former ambassador to Israel, the Palestinian territories, Egypt and Jordan and currently the Paul Martin (Senior) Scholar in Diplomacy at the University of Windsor, it purports to demonstrate the futility of the current fighting and to prescribe a way to reach peace.

The tone of Bell's article, especially in terms of his observations and advice concerning Israel, was barbed, somewhat disdainful and quite smug. For example, at the very outset of the piece, he wrote, "Hundreds of Palestinians have been killed or injured, from toddlers to the aged. Television footage suggests almost all are innocents. Israeli spokesmen dispute that impression and speak in frigid terms of 'collateral damage'." [My emphasis.] The tone detracts from the piece, or rather, reveals another of its dimensions.

But Bell eventually makes an observation that must be read in head-scratching apposition to the observations, two pages earlier of Patrick Martin.

"Hamas is a radical, political-Islamic organization. There are those who think that bringing its leadership into dialogue and negotiation would facilitate concord and in the longer run pave the way to a comprehensive peace between Israel and Palestine. They suggest reconciliation between Hamas, on the one hand, and the Palestinian Authority and Fatah, on the other. There is, however, nothing to indicate this is possible... Hamas and Fatah are rivals for the ragged mantle of Palestine in both the West Bank and Gaza. Fissures run deep... These rivals will not work together, nor can Hamas, which rejects the very concept of a Jewish state, be trusted to negotiate in good faith." [My emphasis.] Bell concisely defines the problem in dealing with Hamas. They will not live alongside a Jewish state in the Middle East.

Then in a somewhat gaping non sequitur to the subject of the current fighting in Gaza, he explains what Israel must do to bring peace: "Moderates must be bolstered and empowered... to be seen by their populations to deliver basic aspirations."

The two things wrong with Bell's conclusion are: first, ever since 1993, at least, if not earlier, Israel, has been trying to do precisely that through its ongoing negotiations with the Palestinian Authority. Second, he places no burden whatsoever upon the Palestinian leaders he would regard as moderate to consider the relevance of Israeli aspirations to live in security and peace too.

Free advice, but not very helpful.

MEMORIAL TO THE DAKAR: In January 1968, the Dakar, a refitted Israeli T-class submarine, left a shipyard in Scotland to conduct sea and dive trials. En route to Haifa, the Dakar disappeared. An international search was launched, but to no avail. In May 1999, an American team found the Dakar at a depth of some 300 metres in the Mediterranean Sea. Its conning tower had been snapped off, and by all accounts, the sub suffered a catastrophic hull rupture, drowning the entire crew. In 2000, the Dakar's bridge was raised, and it is now on display at Haifa's naval museum. This photo shows the memorial to the Dakar on Mt. Herzl in Jerusalem.

Sephardi congregations considering merger

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

One of Toronto's earliest Sephardi congregations may merge with one of the city's largest Sephardi congregations.

Late last year, Congregation Petah Tikvah Anshei Castilla – founded in 1958 as the city's first Spanish-language Sephardi congregation – approached the Sephardic Kehila Centre's Abir Yaakob Congregation to discuss the possibility of a merger, says Maurice Benzacar, vice-president of the Kehila Centre.

In a recent interview, Benzacar confirmed to The CJN that the Kehila Centre has conducted a survey of its congregants to gauge reaction to the idea, and said the feedback so far has been "very positive. They want the merger."

Asked why a merger is necessary now, Benzacar said it would be "good" to combine his centre's congregation with that of Petah Tikvah.

Calls and e-mails from The CJN to Petah Tikvah were not returned.

A survey letter sent to Sephardic Kehila Centre congregants, dated Oct. 29, 2008, was obtained by The CJN.

In it, congregants are told that the merger is being considered because "the future growth and development of our synagogue and the Sephardic Kehila Centre is in question," and that the merger is just one of the strategies being looked at.

Benzacar did not provide details, saying only that Kehila Centre committee members are still "talking" with Petah Tikvah about a potential merger.

The letter also reassures members that "no decision will be entered into lightly and without due diligence." It then goes on to advise that if the attached survey questionnaire was not returned by Nov. 10, 2008, the Kehila Centre would "assume that you are in favour of the merger."

Benzacar said that any talk of finalizing a merger at this time is premature, and that even providing an update on talks between the congregations may "take awhile."

"We're talking to each other and nothing is definite. But we hope. It's a good thing to bring people together in the community under one roof," Benzacar said.

TWO CENTS FOR CHANGE: Jewish teens gathered recently to share their "two cents" on global issues. The workshop, titled Give your Two Cents, Get Back Change, was sponsored by BBYO and led by teens Sarah Katz and Eli Krapivnik. Issues discussed included poverty, global warming, education, immigration, equal rights, war and genocide.

RALLY with ISRAEL

Support Freedom from Terror

Thursday, January 8, 7:30 pm.
Beth Tzedec Congregation,
1700 Bathurst St.

Join thousands of community members to support the people of Israel in their battle against constant missile attacks by Hamas. This year alone, the men, women and children of southern Israel have endured nearly 3,000 missile strikes launched by Hamas terrorists.

It's time to say enough is enough.

It is critical that we stand together with the people of Israel and show our support for those who are living with terror, day after day.

Rally behind Israel

We have seen them before – most recently in 2002, after the Park Hotel massacre in Netanya when Israel sent its troops into Jenin and then, in 2006, during the Second Lebanon War – and we see them, alas, again today: incendiary, hysterical demonstrations against Israel.

Furious protesters flock to the streets in rabid indignation, offended that the Jewish state has deigned to strike back at those who seek its destruction. Lies, mistruths and calumnies are their slogans. Brazen, unveiled threats against Israel are their rallying cries.

"Free Palestine" was the most commonly chanted plea we heard and saw last week from demonstrations in Canada, the United States and Europe.

We know only too well what the code words "Free Palestine" really mean. When that sinister cry rises from the tumult of the protests, the demonstrators are unmasked. They might just as well be chanting "Destroy Israel" or "Kill the Jews."

At first we cringe. Then we seethe. Then we summon our resolve and courage not to surrender our ancient, sacred, life-affirming, people-defining aspirations to the terrorists and their apologists.

Since the very first moment it wrested control of Gaza from the Fatah-oriented Palestinian Authority, Hamas' sole national enterprise has been to harm Israel. Its every strategy and plan, including using Palestinian civilians as human shields and human weapons, have been dedicated to killing as many Jews as possible.

On Al-Aqsa television last year, Fathi Hamad, a Hamas official, eloquently, if not also ghoulishly, explained why it does so. "For the Palestinian people, death became an industry… Accordingly, [Palestinians] created a human shield of women, children, the elderly and the jihad fighters against the Zionist bombing machine, as if they were saying to the Zionist enemy: 'We desire death as you desire life.'"

But Hamas terror and violence today is also aimed at fellow Palestinians. A Hamas official in Gaza was reported to have said last weekend that his security forces had launched a massive "pre-emptive" campaign aimed at thwarting Fatah's attempts to "spread anarchy and chaos." The media reported that "sources close to Hamas revealed over the weekend that the movement had 'executed' more than 35 Palestinians who were suspected of collaborating with Israel and were being held in various Hamas security installations… At least 75 activists were shot in the legs, while others had their hands broken."

Community federations and other groups have organized rallies in support of Israel for tonight, Jan. 8, in Vancouver, Calgary, Winnipeg, Toronto, Ottawa and Montreal.

Israel's war is a just one. The right of the people of Israel to live in peace and security, free from terror, is a just cause. Moreover, it is also our cause. It is, in fact, the cause of the entire free world.

As many of us as possible should attend these rallies.

25 years ago in The CJN

While the Bank of Israel warned about a mounting economic crisis and the government proposed slashing ministries' budgets by nine per cent, 6,000 government workers were either on strike, threatening to strike, or taking job action to demand higher pay or reinstitution of overtime pay or travel allowances. Much of the Israeli bureaucracy was said to be in turmoil.

I am disappointed in your news coverage and reporting. Every time your reporters write an article contrary to what I can only conclude is the left-wing bias of your paper, you label the person being written about as a "hawk," or state that he or she has a "hawkish" attitude or is part of a right-wing organization. On the other hand, you never label those giving opinions that you seem to favour as left-wing or dovish.

The media, your publication included, no longer reports. Rather it gives its opinions and pushes its own agenda. Your paper is no different. Your article reporting on a speech by retired Israeli ambassador to Washington Yoram Ettinger was a prime example ("Retired Israeli ambassador mistrusts Obama," CJN, Dec. 11). At the start of the second paragraph, and presumably to discount as of possible value anything he has to say, you state that he writes a "hawkish" online newsletter. That is your writer's opinion. The former ambassador had a lot of thought-provoking things to say, but I wonder how many of your readers would agree, since he was labelled from the beginning as a hawk.

I would rather read a variety of viewpoints, without labels, and come to my own conclusions. Report incidents from a variety of positions, keeping to the facts. Cut your bias and your paper would be worth reading. Funny how most "liberals" are the first to name call and denigrate others' points of view.

Anti-Semitism on campus

Rebecca Woods Baum, and Hillel, seem to be under the illusion that there is some neat surgical separation between anti-Zionism and anti-Semitism ("Response to Hart (1)," CJN letters, Nov. 27). This reflects a basic failure to understand that although it is perfectly legitimate to criticize Israel according to standards that are applied to other countries, equating Zionism with criminality – as clearly occurs, for example, under the guise of Israeli Apartheid Week – is very much part of 21st-century anti-Semitism.

Further, Woods Baum somehow seems unable to understand that fighting such anti-Semitism on campus is not optional. It is a must if our students and faculty are to preserve their rights and human dignity. A head-in-the-sand approach, based on the hope that these frontal attacks on our community will fade away, is both unrealistic and, as history shows, ultimately irresponsible.

In addition, the insinuation by Woods Baum that those who wish to fight back are using our students as "pawns" is a dangerous distortion of campus reality. In a democracy, if Jewish students do not stand up for their rights against those who seek to dehumanize them by characterizing their support for Israel as part of an international criminal activity, are these students then not giving up the very citizenship and concomitant rights that we all strove so hard to achieve over so many decades? And, if Jewish community organizations do not support our students in this quest for rights and dignity, what exactly do they stand for?

Also, her notion that Hillel is being scapegoated seems to thoroughly obscure the responsibility of that organization. Given the extent of community funds that have been invested in Hillel and the large footprint that the latter has on campuses, it is odd that Hillel should think its responsibilities to our youth do not extend beyond wishful thinking that well-organized, vicious anti-Zionist campus groups will somehow disappear.

Furthermore, it is surely ludicrous to assume that joint pudding-making sessions with opponents and meaningless and directionless dialogues are a substitute for fighting courageously and effectively for the rights of Jewish students and faculty on Canadian campuses.

Conservative Jewish singles

The Canadian Council of Conservative Synagogues (CCCS) and the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism (USCJ) in Toronto face a number of challenges ("Breakaway group launches Conservative shul council," CJN, Nov. 20). But no challenge is perhaps more acute than that faced by Conservative single Jews desirous of meeting members of the opposite sex. And in this area, very little has been done to address such needs.

The Conservative movement, in this regard, might do well to copy the Orthodox movement in Toronto, which has developed a group known as Sasson V Simcha, composed of Orthodox rebbetzins who introduce Orthodox Jewish singles to one another. Sasson V Simcha's efforts have met some success.

Harvey Schiller and Paul Kochber of the CCCS and the USCJ respectively could bridge the differences of their groups in a collaborative way, if they could persuade Conservative rebbetzins to set up a group similar to Sasson V Simcha. At the same time, they would be doing a mitzvah in meeting the needs of their singles.

My son is fighting in Gaza

By YOSSI KLEIN HALEVI

Israeli troops are seen making final preparation for their entry into Gaza Saturday night. [Isranet photo]

"I just heard on the news that Gavriel's base has been shelled," my wife, Sarah, said to me Dec. 30, referring to our 19-year-old son, a member of an Israeli army tank unit waiting on the Gaza border for the order to enter. And, she added in a deliberately calm tone, "A soldier was killed." We texted Gavriel, and within five minutes he called, safe. How, Sarah asked, did families survive war before cellphones?

For days we waited for a cabinet decision: will there be a land invasion or a new ceasefire? The politicians began to bicker while our soldiers waited on the border, in the rain and the mud. Anything but this, I said to Sarah. Not another Lebanon War, which, like Gaza, began with an impressive show of Israeli air power but ended with Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah predicting the imminent end of "the Zionist entity." If we don't win this time – deliver an unambiguous blow if not topple Hamas entirely – our deterrence will further erode, inviting more rocket attacks and encouraging the jihadist momentum throughout the Middle East.

And then I caught myself: how can I be hoping for an outcome that will send my son into battle? This is my first experience as the father of a soldier, and now, after 26 years of living in Israel, I finally understand the terrible responsibility of being an Israeli. I had assumed that I'd become initiated into Israeliness when I myself was drafted into the army as a 34-year-old immigrant in 1989. But perhaps only now have I become fully Israeli. Zionism promised to empower the Jews by making them responsible for their fate. The price for that achievement is to be prepared to make the ultimate sacrifice for one's commitments.

I know Gaza from a previous conflict. During the first intifadah of the late 1980s, when Palestinians revolted against the occupation, I was part of a reservist unit that patrolled Gaza's refugee camps. There I learned that there is no such thing as a benign occupation, as Israelis had once deceived themselves into believing. Our unit not only arrested terrorist suspects, but also dragged people out of their beds in the middle of the night to paint over anti-Israel graffiti and rounded up innocents after a grenade attack just to "make a presence," in army terminology. At night, in our tent, we argued about the wisdom of turning soldiers into policemen of a hostile civilian population that didn't want us there and that we didn't want as part of our society.

A majority of Israelis emerged from the first intifadah convinced that we need to do everything possible to end the occupation and ensure that our children don't serve as enforcers of Gaza's despair. That was why I initially supported the 1993 Oslo peace process that took a terrible gamble on PLO chairman Yasser Arafat's supposed transformation from terrorist to peacemaker. And even after it became clear that Arafat and other Palestinian leaders never intended to accept Israel's legitimacy, I supported the unilateral withdrawal from Gaza in 2005, simply to extricate us from that region, knowing that we would not receive peace in return.

And now my son is fighting in Gaza. The conflict he and his friends confront is far worse than my generation's experience in Gaza. In our time, we were confronted with mere rocks and Molotov cocktails. My son faces Iranian-supplied anti-tank weapons – one more price we will pay, along with the missile attacks on our towns, for the Gaza withdrawal, just as the Israeli right had warned.

Still, I don't regret that withdrawal. If Israelis are united today about our right to defend ourselves against Gaza's genocidally minded regime, it is at least partly because we are fighting from our international border. My son and his friends have one crucial advantage over my generation's experience in Gaza: they know, as we did not, that Israel was ready to make the ultimate sacrifice for peace, uprooting thousands of its citizens from their homes and endorsing a Palestinian state. My son confronts Gaza knowing that its misery is now imposed by its leaders. He knows that his country was even prepared to share its most cherished national asset, Jerusalem, with its worst enemy, Arafat, for the sake of preventing this war. That empowers him with the moral self-confidence he will need to get through the coming days. The face of my Gaza enemy was a teenager throwing rocks; the face of Gavriel's Gaza enemy is a suicide bomber.

But we are hardly free of moral anxiety. Even as I pray for Gavriel's physical safety, I pray too for his spiritual well-being: that his tank doesn't accidentally shell civilians, that he isn't caught in some terrible mistake, which can so easily happen in a war zone where terrorists hide behind innocent people.

For the past eight years, Israel has fought a single war with shifting fronts, moving from suicide bombings in Jerusalem and Tel Aviv to Katyusha attacks on Israeli towns near the Lebanon border to Qassam missiles on Israeli towns near the Gaza border. That war has targeted civilians, turning the home front into the actual front. And it has transformed the nature of the conflict from a nationalist struggle over Palestinian statehood to a holy war against Jewish statehood. Except for a left-wing fringe, most Israelis recognize the conflict in Gaza as part of a larger war that has been declared against our being and that we must fight.

But how? Even some right-wingers are saying that we should have declared a unilateral ceasefire after the initial air strike and then dared Hamas to continue shelling our towns, rather than risk another quagmire. And even some left-wingers are saying that we should now destroy the Hamas regime and then offer to turn Gaza over to international control or, if possible, an inter-Arab force led by Egypt. Every option is potentially disastrous. Most Israelis agree on two points: that we cannot live with a jihadist statelet on our border, and that we cannot become occupiers of Gaza again.

The despair of Gaza is contagious. One friend, a Likud supporter, said to me, "I don't know what to hope for anymore."

Meanwhile, I try to reassure myself about Gavriel's safety. Growing up in Jerusalem during the suicide bombings in the early 2000s, he has already known danger, intimacy with death. A 13-year-old acquaintance was stoned to death and was so mutilated that he could be identified only by his DNA. A friend lost the use of an eye in a bus bombing on his way to school. At least now, Gavriel and his friends can defend themselves. Perhaps one reason most of them volunteered for combat units was because now the generation of the suicide bombings can finally fight back.

Just before the conflict in Gaza began, I happened to visit Gavriel at his base. His unit's barracks had been turned into what young Israelis call a zula – a hangout. There were muddy couches, chairs without backs, a darbuka drum, a TV (Jay Leno was on). It could have been a teenage scene anywhere in the West, except that hanging on the walls were Hamas banners captured by the unit's veteran members in a previous round of fighting in Gaza. In a corner of the room hung a photograph of a fallen soldier. Across the bottom someone had written, "What was the rush, Shachar? Why did you have to leave us so soon?"

Even now, perhaps especially now, I feel that our family is privileged to belong to the Israeli story. Gavriel, grandson of a Holocaust survivor, is part of an army defending the Jewish people in its land. This is one of those moments when our old ideals are tested anew and found to be still vital. That provides some comfort as Sarah and I wait for the next text message.

A play in the Warsaw Ghetto

A play set to music, called Imagine This, was planned for the Broadway stage in 2005, but the project had to be shelved because of insufficient financing.

Faring somewhat better in London's West End recently by at least making it to the stage, the show, unfortunately, lasted for just a few weeks. It closed on Dec. 20, purportedly a victim of both the economic downturn and less than flattering reviews. Even in its natural niche audience, the Jewish community, it has had a decidedly mixed reception – and with valid reason.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

Creating a musical within the broader theme of the Holocaust is understandably troubling. Regardless of the care taken to avoid offence, such productions are bound to be viewed as morally dubious. And though accusations of disrespect, or at least distaste, have not for the most part been publicly levelled at this particular play, its flop at the box office likely reflects some of the ambivalence with which it's been regarded.

But get beyond such misgivings, and what Imagine This provides is a passionate and powerful depiction of Jewish courage and defiance in the face of horrendous oppression. With the Warsaw Ghetto as its setting, the musical focuses on a troupe of Jewish actors who, while living in the ghetto and performing to survive, enact the story of Masada. The defining anthem that seals the juxtaposition between the Warsaw Ghetto and the Masada experiences is perhaps contained in the poignant rendering of one of the songs, which goes: "The past lives on in tales like these, how we chose, standing upright, to remain standing upright, not to live life on our knees… imagine this."

Aside from her unseemly personalized comments, Rebecca Woods Baum's bizarre interpretation of my position on campus advocacy ("Response to Hart [1]," CJN, Nov. 27, 2008) reflects precisely the sort of defensiveness, rigidity and intolerance that causes such divisiveness among various of our student groups.

But amid her many revelations, the most profoundly disturbing is her assertion that there is a separation between campus anti-Zionism and anti-Semitism. Such a declaration not only flies in the face of what is widely accepted as modern anti-Semitism, but also sanitizes and substantively weakens the case that we should be making to protect the rights and dignity of our Jewish campus communities.

Also, to infer that I am "creating a scapegoat [of Hillel]" is preposterous. Given the mainstream recognition that Hillel enjoys on campus, not to mention the generous funding it receives, surely it is reasonable to hold it accountable not only when it is successful, but also when it appears to fall short of expectation. Without doubt, a revamp of its Israel advocacy activities is drastically needed, and the sooner the better.

Israeli election system needs an overhaul

Politicians in Israel are unpopular. They're perceived as self-serving and often just plain corrupt. Police investigations and court proceedings against prime ministers, presidents, ministers and members of Knesset are weekly occurrences. With them as role models, little new blood is infused into the political system, as talented young people look to other avenues to realize their genius, wary of the quagmire.

The public's disdain is also expressed in a continued decline in voter turnout for Knesset elections. While this does not necessarily reflect apathy in a society where everyone has an opinion about everything, it does echo Israeli voter fatigue due to frequent general elections and people's repugnance of anything political.

Yuri Lansberg in Jerusalem

Under Israel's proportional representation system, the Knesset's 120 seats are divided proportionally among parties according to their electoral success. A party receiving 25 per cent of the vote gets 30 seats, and so on. There are no local constituencies and MKs are not directly accountable to voters. A party need only get two per cent of the vote to be represented in Parliament. This gives rise to an abundance of parties. Thirty-one ran in 2003. Twelve got enough votes to get into the Knesset.

Supporters assert this scheme results in the Knesset democratically mirroring the diversity of political views existing within society and that this is what true democracy is all about.

Critics claim an abundance of parties creates governmental havoc, particularly in Israel, where no party has ever gained a majority. After elections, the largest party's leader is tasked with forming a coalition government. Given the number of parties, putting that puzzle together requires backroom peddling and promise making, with each faction extorting benefits not always for the general good. When this task is finally completed, the government formed is forever susceptible to demands of parties holding the balance of power. The outcome is stalemates and stagnation. Effective decision-making is often frustrated and governments fall far too often.

This is dangerous in a country whose leaders are ceaselessly charged with making complex decisions regarding war and peace, not to mention Israel's economic challenges during the current global meltdown.

There are other reasons for the distaste many Israelis feel for politics and politicians. Before elections, each party announces its list of candidates and their rank within these lists. These lists are formed using various methods. Some parties have central committees or advisory boards who decide who'll be on their list and in which order. Others have the rabbis decide.

The latest trend is primaries. Several of the larger parties have recently held such votes in preparation for the Feb. 10 elections, hoping large party electorates will produce lists not corrupted by inner party power struggles. However, as recent events have shown, these hopes have not materialized, as vote contractors, deal-making and suspected fraud have infested the primaries, producing candidate lists that are much the same as those of the outgoing Knesset, if not worse. Worthy legislators (there are a few) with no broad political base, have been relegated to unrealistic positions on their party lists, often replaced by party apparatchiks.

A major overhaul of our election system is necessary. We must look to greener pastures for examples suitable for Israel, where mixtures of both proportional representation and British-style parliamentarianism act together.

Such is the case in Germany, where half the legislature is elected proportionally and the other in ridings and constituencies throughout the country. Each citizen gets two votes, one for a national list and the other for a candidate in his riding.

An even more interesting version of this method exists in New Zealand where its legislature, like Israel's, has only 120 seats.

Moreover, in both these countries, parties must obtain at least five per cent of the popular vote to gain entry into Parliament.

This model ensures at least half of MPs are directly elected on their merits, providing their constituents a personal representative to whom they can address worries and grievances. It makes for more responsible politicians.

At the same time, parties elected proportionally ensure Parliament will continue to represent the diverse views existing within society, while the five per cent threshold effectively narrows the number of parties, discouraging smaller ones from running at all.

This combined model of elections might serve Israel well. It would not do away with all the darker sides of party politicking, and that's precisely why its implementation could just about succeed. Conversely, adding an element of political accountability might help re-engage a cynical, disappointed and disgruntled public and renew its faith in the politicians who govern us.

Israeli fringe groups set the agenda

Israel is facing a number of major challenges from the outside – Iran, Hamas, Hezbollah, and Al Qaida, to name a few – and crisis from within, including leadership, education, the unresolved religious/secular dispute, and more. But instead of focusing on these basic problems, some Israelis are wasting resources obsessing over fringe causes and fighting minor battles with each other.

This problem applies equally to the right and left of the Israeli political spectrum, and the ardent supporters of both camps in the Diaspora. On the right, the desperate attempt to establish and hold on to one more outpost and caravan in the Judea and Samaria regions of the West Bank has become an end in itself, totally out of proportion to the wider picture. In Hebron, the attempt to use force to occupy a building which may or may not have been purchased legally, has mobilized hundreds of dedicated young Israelis into a misguided frenzy.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

Instead of using their intelligence and energies on the wider threats to the Israeli and the Jewish people in these difficult times, they are battling the police, the army and the courts for a few hundred meters of property. Hebron is important in Jewish history, but it is not more important than the survival of the State of Israel, and the efforts put into this battle are entirely disproportionate.

Similarly, more than three years after the unilateral withdrawal of the Jewish settlements from Gaza, the activists and former residents are still fighting battles against this decision. In retrospect, the decision to evacuate the military bases was a mistake, as was the failure to respond forcefully when the first rockets were fired, and later when Hamas took control. But at this stage, it is useless to demand a reversal in history, and expect that these communities will be re-established under Israeli control in Gaza. The energies wasted to artificially maintain the fiction of a return to Gaza scenario are wasted.

On the left, leaders of self-selected groups like B'tselem, Machsom Watch and dozens of others are seeking to impose their personal views of a messianic peace by exploiting human rights claims. In this secular religion, the main goal is to force Israel to return to the 1949 armistice line (the so-called pre-1967 Green Line) and establish a Palestinian state in this territory. But peace with Palestinians engaged in their own civil war, while continuing to reject the legitimacy of a Jewish state regardless of borders, is far more complex than "ending the occupation."

Having failed to sell this idealized vision in the Israeli democratic process, these organizations are now turning to lobbying against Israel from the outside. B'tselem has opened an office in Washington, in the effort to lobby Congress – one of the most important bastions of support for Israel in the important battles – to join the chorus of attackers.

The money for much of this destructive activity, which greatly amplifies the impact of a small number of individuals, comes in large part from Diaspora Jews who have bought into or, in some cases, are among the leaders of these diversionary causes. Wealthy individuals and foundations pay for many of the advertising campaigns and other activities for both left and right. Donors to the New Israel Fund give millions of dollars to promote groups like B'tselem, Adalah, Mossawa, New Profile (a member of the Coalition of Women for Peace, and are under investigation by the Israeli attorney general for encouraging refusal of military service). With this legitimization, outsiders with their own agendas, including the Ford Foundation, the European Union and anti-Israel church groups, provide additional funds for fringe groups.

As is often the case, the two ends of the political spectrum often meet at the extremes. In this case, both the left and right fringes are attacking and undermining the IDF – the main framework that insures Israeli survival. And they are spinning Israel into an increasingly dangerous orbit.

MFO contributes to peace in the Middle East

For almost three decades, the Multinational Force and Observers has played an integral role in stabilizing Israel's historic peace treaty with Egypt. "We're a confidence builder," said Michael Sternberg, a senior MFO official in Tel Aviv. "A model peacekeeping force."

Sheldon Kirshner in Tel Aviv

Consisting of 1,700 soldiers, sailors, aviators, technicians and engineers from 11 countries, including Canada, the MFO supervises the security provisions of the treaty to ensure that military violations do not occur. Serving at the pleasure of Israel and Egypt, the force was formed in the wake of the 1973 Yom Kippur War, when the two main combatants, Israel and Egypt, turned to the United Nations and the United States to bring about a ceasefire.

As a result, the UN dispatched peacekeepers to the Sinai Peninsula to physically separate the Israeli and Egyptian armies and monitor Israel's first disengagement agreement with Egypt. That accord, hammered out by the then U.S. secretary of state, Henry Kissinger and known as Sinai I, was signed in January 1974. In September 1975, with the signing of Sinai II, the United States agreed to establish the Sinai Field Mission, the forerunner of the MFO, which began its mission in February 1976.

More than a year later, the then president of Egypt, Anwar Sadat, visited Jerusalem in a spectacular gesture, setting into motion a series of talks that culminated with the 1978 Camp David Accords, which created a framework for peace between Israel and Egypt. On March 26, 1979, Israel and Egypt signed a peace treaty formally ending their 31-year-old state of war and paving the way for Israel's phased withdrawal from Sinai, captured by Israel in the 1967 Six Day War.

In the meantime, efforts were made to form a permanent UN peacekeeping force in the Sinai. Due to objections by the Soviet Union, which was at odds with the United States over a number of global issues, such a force did not materialize. With the UN out of the picture, Israel, Egypt and the United States launched negotiations to set up an alternative peacekeeping force.

On Aug. 3, 1981, the MFO came into being. The MFO – which is funded in equal parts by Israel, Egypt and the United States – verifies compliance with the peace treaty by ensuring that neither side violates limitations on military forces and equipment in three security zones in the Sinai – A, B and C – and in one security enclave in Israel, known as Zone D.

In Zone A, closest to the Egyptian mainland, Egypt is permitted to station a mechanized infantry division of up to 22,000 troops and early warning systems. Egypt is also allowed to maintain up to 4,000 soldiers in Zone B. The MFO is based in Zone C, but Egypt is permitted to position lightly armed police there as well.

In Zone D, which falls within sovereign Israeli territory, Israel may deploy four infantry battalions comprising no more than 4,000 troops and early warning systems.

The MFO operates checkpoints and observation posts and carries out reconnaissance patrols in Zone C and along the adjacent international boundary. It also guarantees freedom of international marine navigation in the Strait of Tiran and access to the Gulf of Aqaba.

The MFO is composed of personnel from the United States, Canada, France, Italy, Hungary, Norway, Australia, New Zealand, Uruguay, Colombia and Fiji.

The United States contributes the biggest contingent, 685 troops. Canada's contribution consists of 28 soldiers, representing all three branches of the armed forces and ranging in rank from corporal to colonel.

Commanded by a major-general from Norway, the force is locally headquartered at North Camp in El Gorah, 37 kilometres southeast of the town of El Arish. All the Canadian peacekeepers are based there. The smaller South Camp, located near Sharm el Sheikh, is on the southeast tip of the Sinai peninsula on a bluff overlooking the Red Sea.

In addition, the MFO maintains 30 smaller observatory sites within Zone C. One of them, on Tiran Island, off Sharm El Sheikh, technically lies in Saudi Arabian territory.

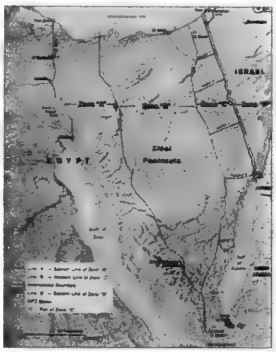
The MFO has at its disposal three infantry battalions, a support battalion, a coastal patrol unit, rotary wing and fixed aviation elements, a transport and engineering unit, an air traffic control unit and military police.

The force is headed by a director-general based in Rome. The current office holder, James LaRocco, is a retired American diplomat. He and his staff audit operations and are in charge of management, recruitment and procurement.

The MFO has regional offices in Tel Aviv and Cairo. Sternberg, a 71-year-old former U.S. State Department employee, has been the director-general's representative in Israel for the past 17 years.

"Representatives must be American citizens and have diplomatic and military backgrounds," Sternberg explained in a recent interview in his spacious office, which offers a panoramic view of Hayarkon Park.

Sternberg and his colleague in Cairo see to it that the MFO is always well supplied. As he put it, "The Sinai is an inhospitable desert, and the MFO requires a lot of logistical support, from food and water to medical and technical equipment."



International peacekeepers patrol the Sinai Peninsula

Born in New York City, Sternberg served in the U.S. Navy for nine years before joining the American foreign service. From 1973 to 1979, he was deputy director of Israeli and Palestinian affairs in the State Department, working with the then secretary of state, Henry Kissinger. From 1975 until 1981, he was chief of staff of the Camp David autonomy talks, which fizzled out. As well, Sternberg was consul general in Thessaloniki, Greece.

The MFO performs its duties quietly, he said. "We keep a low profile. Our job is to serve the parties through our discretion. We don't seek out publicity."

Everyone agrees that the MFO has been remarkably successful in carrying out its mandate, ostensibly because Israel and Egypt fully support its deployment. "There is almost universal backing for the MFO in both countries," he noted. "As long as the parties feel we add value and stability to their respective security, the MFO will continue to function."

Sternberg, however, would not be drawn into a discussion as to whether Israel or Egypt have ever violated military clauses of the peace treaty.

Four nations – Israel, Egypt, the United States and Germany – provide the majority of the funds for its $65 million (US) annual budget. An additional four countries – Switzerland, Japan, Holland and Norway – are also funders. "We're a cost effective organization," said Sternberg. "Our budget is equivalent to the cost of two aircraft."

Describing the MFO as one of the most efficient peacekeeping forces in the world, he observed, "We're a model for peacekeeping operations. We're an important institution for preserving peace in this area."

Nonetheless, the MFO has been targeted by Arab terrorists. In 1984, the director-general, Leamon Hunt, was assassinated outside his private residence in Rome. And in 2005 and 2006, MFO armored vehicles were ambushed.

Accidents have also plagued the MFO. In 1985, a chartered airplane carrying 248 peacekeepers from the United States crashed in Gander, Nfld., killing all aboard. Almost two years ago, an MFO aircraft went down in the Sinai, causing the deaths of nine French and Canadian passengers.

Despite these tragedies, the MFO – perhaps the harbinger of an international peacekeeping force to patrol the Gaza Strip after the current fighting between Israel and Hamas dies down – is still going strong and contributing to peace in at least one strategic corner of the Middle East.

Mental illness called a 'well-hidden' problem

"We have such a vibrant Jewish community. We have 200,000 Jews in the community who support wonderful things like Baycrest and Reena and Zareinu, and I don't want to take away from them, but this is where we would like to be. There is such a need for assistance and housing in a Jewish environment, in a Jewish setting for young adults," Rachel said.

"We do need to do some serious fundraising. The money is out there. We have one of the most affluent Jewish communities in the world."

Richard Cummings

She added that it is important to get through to UJA Federation of Greater Toronto to get more funding.

"I understand Israel is very important, and I don't want to take away from Israel. Jewish education is very important. If you're not going to educate young Jewish people, you might as well close the synagogue doors, but this issue also needs the support of the Jewish community."

Jewish Family and Child (JF&C) executive director Richard Cummings and JF&C supervisor and social worker Fay Geitzhals agree that appealing to the compassion and judgment of the community is the key to improving the situation.

'This issue needs the support of the Jewish community'

"People are learning. The Centre for Addiction and Mental Health and the Globe and Mail… have done a great deal to bring the story to the surface, and I think people are much more understanding and compassionate," Cummings said.

"I think we are ready as a community to evolve into being more supportive. The de-institutionalization that took place decades ago has left a significant cohort of individuals with mental illness just wandering through the community. We shouldn't assume that the community won't step up. Maybe we can look more optimistically and hopefully at our raising consciousness and sensitization and consider that the community is ready to step up to the plate."

Geitzhals, who thinks that mental illness in the Jewish community is a well-hidden problem, said that "it's similar to any of the other issues that we've raised in the Jewish community like woman abuse or addiction, in that once we raise awareness and put it out there, the community is ready to take a look at it and to acknowledge that it exists and create a system for it."

She suggested that one of the services needed to properly care for the mentally ill is a good trusteeship program.

If an elderly couple is concerned about an adult child who is living with them and they don't know how to care for their child once their own health begins to deteriorate, she could help the parents and the child become more independent, Geitzhals said.

In her capacity at JF&C, she would take over trusteeship or help them get a trustee, perhaps a sibling, and then investigate what resources might be available for the child to remain in the home or move to a different setting such as a group home.

"Rather than saying you've done wrong, I think together we can envision a way of doing right. There is a different nuance there. It doesn't have to be a battle," she said.

"We as an agency are doing our utmost, but more help is needed and more resources are needed," Cummings said.

For information, call JF&C at 416-638-7800 or contact Goldman-Brown at rochelle@chaitikvah.org or 905-886-6520.

CIVIC HERO: Vaughan resident Ellise Gasner was recently presented with the city's Civic Hero Award in council chambers. Gasner was recognized for her commitment to the environment and her involvement in the large household recycling program, a one-year pilot project that addresses the needs of large households in the City of Vaughan. Households consisting of seven or more people have the opportunity to apply for an exemption to the Greening Vaughan standard program relating to waste and recycling. Upon approval of the exemption, the household receives, free of charge, one additional blue box and green bin and 25 garbage tags. The civic hero award is designed to recognize the residents whose deeds, in the opinion of council, demonstrate examples of civic responsibility. Here Vaughan city council members and the Gasner family – Ellise Gasner in the centre holding the award is flanked by Mayor Linda Jackson and Ward 5 Councillor Alan Shefman, who nominated her.

Chabad Richmond Hill opens new building

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

After 11 years in temporary quarters, Chabad Lubavitch of Richmond Hill is gearing up for an inaugural banquet Jan. 15 and an open house three days later, featuring food, crafts, music and dancing at its new 10,000-square-foot building.

The open house will run from 11 a.m. to 1 p.m. on Sunday, Jan. 18.

The Chabad Romano Centre is located at 10,500 Bathurst St.on a 2.5-acre tract of land south of Teston Road.

Land developer Mario Romano, who is also contributing to the cost of the synagogue, donated the land to Chabad. In a 2006 article, Romano told The CJN that when he was growing up in Buenos Aires, most of his neighbourhood friends were Jewish, and that he wanted to "have respect for" the Jewish community in the area of the new centre.

The building's sanctuary, featuring a dark-stained ark and windows forming the shape of a menorah, can seat "300 comfortably," according to Rabbi Mendel Bernstein, spiritual leader of the congregation.

At 10,000 square feet, the $3 million building is more than triple the size of the 3,000-square-foot space Chabad occupied in rented premises diagonally across the road, at the northeast corner of Bathurst Street and Elgin Mills Road, for the past half-dozen years.

Rabbi Bernstein said that there is enough land to more than double the current size of the new synagogue, but that finances did not permit a larger building right now. "This is phase one," he said.

"It's absolutely a dream come true. A real shul is something we've looked forward to from the day we moved here," said Rabbi Bernstein in an interview in a basement classroom of the the new centre Dec. 22, as construction continued upstairs.

Sitting in the as yet unfurnished classroom, its floor covered with fine dust from the ongoing work, the rabbi recalled that after he and his wife Toby first moved to Richmond Hill in 1997, their basement served as the synagogue for almost five years.

The congregation's growth is also reflected by the hiring two years ago of Rabbi Shlomo Vorovitch as program and youth director.

Rabbi Bernstein said the new shul's four classrooms would serve Chabad's preschool students and "hopefully also [part of] the Hebrew school."

Almost 250 children from senior kindergarten through Grade 7 attend Chabad's Hebrew school in Richmond Hill. Classes are currently held in rented public school premises.

The new building had its ground-breaking on June 15. Its lease expired at the end of December.

In the rented premises, a large preschool classroom doubled as the sanctuary, which served about 100 worshippers on an average Shabbat morning.

"We had to fold away our small shul after every Shabbos," said the rabbi. "Everything had to be on wheels."

Chabad Richmond Hill also holds twice-daily services, mornings and evenings.

For further information about the synagogue or its opening events, go to www.chabadrc.org., or call 905-770-7700. Tickets for the banquet cost $150 per person; the daytime event is free.

Bucharest Kristallnacht: Yizkor

"Probably no country has had a darker record in the treatment of its Jews than Romania. It was the most virulently anti-Semitic country in prewar Europe."
–Nora Levin, The Holocaust

By BARUCH COHEN
In loving memory of Malca z"l

The painful events of Jan. 21 to 23, 1941, perpetrated by the Romanian Nazi regime, the "Legionaries," signalled the beginning of the Romanian Jewish Holocaust. I was 21 years old. I was there. I am a witness to the Bucharest Kristallnacht.

Five historians have described those infamous days this way:

Nora Levin: "The violence has been described by eyewitnesses as an unspeakable butchery. Iron Guardists stormed into the Jewish quarter in Bucharest, burning synagogues and demolishing homes and stores. For miles around the city, bodies were found without clothes and without teeth. In the morgue, bodies were so cut up they were no longer recognizable as human. In the municipal slaughterhouse [where, on Jan. 25, I went to search for my missing father –BC], bodies were observed hanging like carcasses of cattle." –The Holocaust: The Destruction of European Jewry 1933-1945, Thomas Y. Crowell Company N.Y. 1968.

Matatias Carp: "The fascist terror and persecution exerted on the Jewish communities within the bounds of Romania were as violent and destructive as they were in other countries of Nazi domination and influence. Romanian fascism had its own 'original' methods in order to exterminate 'their' Jews. In three days – Jan. 21-23, 1941, 130 Jews were brutally killed." –The Black Book: Cartea Neagra, Diogene Publishing, Bucharest, 1946, reprinted 1996.

Lucy S. Dawidowicz: "In January 1941, a massacre took place in Bucharest, in which about 170 Jews were murdered in an especially abhorrent manner." –The War Against the Jews: 1933-1945, Holt, Rinehart and Winston, N.Y,. 1975.

I.C. Butnaru: "For a period of more than 72 hours, the Jewish districts were at the mercy of the masses. During this interval, several thousand Jews were hauled out of their houses, arrested in the streets, houses of prayer, stores, places of work; and transferred to legionary headquarters, police precinct houses, or even to some synagogues, for example the Malbim Synagogue, which had been occupied and converted into a torture centre… The Jewish districts in Bucharest were left for a period of three days and three nights at the mercy of the vilest and most barbarian fascist elements, which had been educated, incited and trained for years for that 'great' hour!" –The Silent Holocaust: Romania and its Jews, Greenwood Press, New York, 1992.

Radu Ioanid: "Most of the murders during the three days took place in Jilava Forest, the rest at the slaughterhouse at the intersection of the roads of Fundeni and Pantelimon, in Bucharest's Noi district. On Jan. 21, the 'Legionaries' gathered about 200 Jews into the basement of their headquarters. The fascists did not forget to take all of the victims' valuables before they set upon the Jews. They drove the Jews in the basement up to the attic under the rain of blows. Prisoners were finally made to drink from their basin in which Rabbi Gutman had been permitted to wash the blood from his head.

"Other Legionaries trucked the second group of more than 90 Jews via Gurgin Road to Jilava Forest, where they shot most of them, after which the murderers stole the gold teeth, clothes and shoes from the corpses that they left under the trees." –The Holocaust in Romania: The Destruction of Jews and Gypsies Under the Antonescu Regime, 1940-1944, Ivan R. Dee and the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum, Chicago 2000.

On Oct. 22-23, 2008, at the Giurgiului Bucharest Jewish Cemetery, a symbolic pogrom took place, indicating that in today's Romania, anti-Semitism, hooliganism and fascism are as present as they always have been: 133 graves were destroyed. The Romanian authorities discovered the perpetrators of this crime: children age 12 and 13. Since no disciplinary measures could supposedly be taken against children, the case was closed. This is today's Romania, whose Jewish population numbers some 6,000 elderly people, out of a former Jewish population of 900,000 prior to World War II.

Don't judge a book by its cover

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

Allowing children to think and develop autonomously vis a vis monitoring their exposure to outside culture is always a delicate balance for parents, and never more so when it comes to nurturing their perspectives Jewishly. Both professionally and personally, I am interested in the books that children read about Judaism and Israel, and religion in general. To that end, a cautionary tale.

Recently, while scanning the children's section of my local public library, I ran across a book with the title What Muslims Think and How they Live, by Rick Hodges. I signed out the book and eventually came to the sixth chapter. It is titled "Views on the Issue of Palestine," which in and of itself, gave me a sense of the direction the writing might be headed in, and I was not misled. One of the opening sentences of the chapter delivers the message loud and clear: "The Israeli-Palestinian issue is only one of many instances where U.S. foreign policy involvement in the Islamic world has angered and offended Muslims."

Moving sideways from that pronouncement, Hodges briefly summarizes Judaism as the oldest monotheistic faith and recounts the Jews' settlement in Canaan and the subsequent conquests of the Assyrians, Babylonians, Persian, Greeks and Romans. As we move to the modern period and the first stirrings of the Zionist movement, the book's take on history begins to reveal itself once again: "Initially, Palestinian Arabs welcomed the new settlers, but as the Jews took over more land, the Muslim Arabs began to resist." Is this muted code for the 1929 Hebron massacre and other incidents of destruction? A child might never know.

The rest of the book's narrative is inevitable. Palestinian Arabs flee their homes, "hoping to avoid violence, terrorism and war," and after June 1967, there is an "Israeli occupation" and Palestinians are "permitted few rights in Israeli society." This lack of rights leads to understandable Palestinian "anger at the lack of progress and at their oppressive living conditions." Somewhat quickly and blithely, the book sweeps through Oslo and its aftermath with the following conclusion: "In the end, [Yasser] Arafat and the Palestinians felt they had been betrayed both by Israel, which had not lived up to its Oslo promises, and by the United States, which had not made Israel meet its commitments."

The book is packaged in a quasi-scholarly way, as part of a larger book series called "Introducing Islam," under the general editorship of Dr. Khaleed Abou El-Fadl, a well-known academic at the UCLA school of law. A child encountering all of this could not be faulted for absorbing the information as beyond reproach.

Readers, depending on their political inclinations, may see the work as distortion/outright fabrication, or as a correct attempt to portray the Arab perspective towards western imperialism (the United States predictably is scolded over and over again as provoking Arab resentment). My interest here is to both reflect on what it is the ordinary Canadian child runs across in the library, and to remind parents of the obvious – that libraries carry books of varying orientations, some of which may not be amenable in any way to your particular family's point of view.

"המילה אחריות היא המילה המדהימה ביותר בשפה העברית: ראשית היא מתחילה ב-א ומסתיימת ב-ת, והכוונה היא כשכשמישהו לוקח אחריות, היא צריכה להיות כוללת מהתחלה עד הסוף.

אחר-השלב הבא הוא לקחת אחריות על האחֵר-והכוונה היא על כל אדם.

אחֵרי-ברגע שלקחתי אחריות על שלושת המעגלים הראשונים אני יכול להוביל אחֵרי.

אחרי-אמונה. יש שיגידו אלוהים, יש אלה שיגידו הבריאה, או ארגיה קוסמית.

מה שעוד לומדים מהמילה המדהימה הזו הוא שיש חשיבות לסדר: אדם אינו יכול להיות אחראי על אחרים לפני שהוא אחראי על עצמו.

Shalev novel includes lessons about pigeons

A Pigeon and a Boy by Meir Shalev, Random House.

Books
Bernard Baskin

Yair Mendelsohn is an Israeli tour guide, unhappy in his thankless job and saddened by his enervating marriage. His mother advises him to seek two things he truly needs – a stirring story and a home that he can call his own.

In time, he reports to his mother with a compelling story about a teenage boy who becomes a homing pigeon handler with the fledgling Jewish army, both before and during the War of Independence.

He was called the Baby because he was short and chubby, and always busy with his birds, and he never let anyone get near the loft because he didn't want to frighten them.

Pigeons are a recurring motif in the lives of Baby and the young woman he loves. The reader learns a good deal about pigeons. For example, with a regular pigeon, the beak protrudes from the head like the handle on a skillet, but the homing pigeon's beak runs straight from the line of the forehead and she has a light-colored swelling. In addition, her build is stronger, her shoulders broader, and inside she has the lungs and heart of an athlete. And if you see her fly, she flies alone, in a straight line, higher than regular pigeons.

Baby is killed in battle, but not before he performs a hardly believable act and dispatches a message to his beloved that only she can understand. "The pigeon ascended rapidly. Above the flames, above the smoke, above the gunshots, above the shouts, to the sky blue, the silence Homeward. To her. Cross the great sea of air that has no borders or sounds but for the whistling of the wind in your feathers and the pulsing of your blood and the shouting of my words on your leg."

Her response is quick and likewise hardly credible. I leave it to readers to discover her reaction for themselves.

In the second portion of the novel, Yair's mother tells her son that he must always personally greet his house on his return. "Say hello to the house, she instructs him and listen closely because it will always answer back."

Yair eventually finds his dream home. "I came to it returning, not arriving. Hello, house, I said to it and it answered me. I built and was built, I loved and was loved, my soul grew a new skin, a roof, a floor, a wall. I have a wooden deck and an outdoor shower, and time and a story and a view and a tin to hear the rain during the approaching winter."

Shalev's novel offers an arresting portrait of Israel from pre-statehood days to the present. His poetic style and keen eye for his country's beauty enhance the reader's enjoyment. He describes his home as one that "looks out on hills upon hills, like the backs of sheep growing distant and paler and topped with small and stubborn mastic trees and slopes running yellow."

This novel which was awarded Israel's the prestigious Brenner Prize is highly recommended.

Modern Israeli money

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

They are the elite of Israeli society: presidents and prime ministers, rabbis and poets. And their portraits can be yours to hang on a wall or carry in your pocket. Israel's modern currency tells the story of the evolution of the country by depicting its heroes and its symbols, new and old. As Israel celebrates its 60th anniversary, you can follow the country's numismatic history of pounds, prutot, agarot and shkalim.

The Bank of Israel has put together an impressive site, particularly in the area devoted to Israel Notes and Coins. [tinyurl.com/bankisr] Along the way, there are some great anecdotes.

On the eve of the establishment of the country, banknotes could not be printed locally, since the British Mandate had not yet expired and because of the lack of local expertise. At the same time, foreign firms did not want to print money for a nonexistent state. Eventually, the American Banknote Company of New York was persuaded to help. But in order to get approval from the U.S. State Department to print foreign banknotes, it had to give no indication on the notes that they were "legal tender." That phrase had to be printed onto the bills later. [tinyurl.com/bankisr2]

When the notes were printed, the name of the new country hadn't yet been decided, so the phrase "Palestine Pound" was used on the notes (as it had been during the Mandate). The banknotes reached the country secretly in July 1948 and went into circulation the following month. It wasn't until the country was four years old that it had its own "Israel pounds." You can read about – and view – very early coins and banknotes of the British Mandate of Palestine at the informative page created by Howard M. Berlin. [drberlin.com/palestine]

Every so often, you come across a website that is not only thorough and entertaining, but clearly a labour of love. Pinchas Bar-Zeev's SHEQEL – The Online Catalog of Israel Numismatics 1927-present clearly falls into that category. It painstakingly illustrates coins dating back to the British Mandate through the current new shekel series. [tinyurl.com/sheqel] Future sections will focus on state medals, numismatic covers and telephone coins – asimonim – which veteran visitors to Israel will remember with some exasperation as tokens that had to be horded if you ever wanted a shot at using an Israeli payphone. [tinyurl.com/asimon]

Many coins minted in Israel are not legal tender but have been created to honour a personality or a celebrity. The Israel Government Coins & Medals Corporation has released a Book of Psalms with a Shema Yisrael medal, medallions with the likeness of the Lubavitcher Rebbe, as well as reproductions of the works of Marc Chagall and Édouard Manet. [tinyurl.com/isragift]

While Canadians have been embroiled in heated debates about whether to retire the penny, Israelis said goodbye to both the one- and five-agorah coins (which cost 16 agorot to mint.) [tinyurl.com/5agorot] On the other hand, Israel is among the first countries in the world to introduce a banknote printed on polymer. The 20-new Israel shekel note is being printed on the plastic-type material that's more durable than paper and incorporates sophisticated security features. [tinyurl.com/polybill]

Did you return from your last trip to Israel with local bills you didn't have time to exchange? They're probably OK, but you may want to read up on how to protect yourself from counterfeit Israeli bills in circulation. Look for watermarks, security threads, microtext, and my favourite: two triangles printed on both sides of the bill that when held up to a light form a perfect Magen David. [tinyurl.com/securemoney]

Israel's current set of banknotes has been around for 10 years and carries portraits of former prime minister Moshe Sharett and writer Shmuel Yosef Agnon, as well as former president Zalman Shazar on the highest denomination in circulation, the 200-new Israel shekel bill. A 500-new Israel shekel banknote will be added in the future. The next personality to be honoured: Yitzhak Rabin. [tinyurl.com/bankisr3]

And if you happen to have a drawer full of older banknotes that were withdrawn from circulation in 2000 – carrying the likenesses of Maimonides, Levi Eshkol and Golda Meir – don't worry. You can exchange them for crisp new ones at any branch of the Bank of Israel until the end of 2010. [tinyurl.com/oldnote]

Visit to Sderot

By MENUCHA LEVIN

Just one hour away from chilly Jerusalem there is a sunny small town surrounded by green fields, with spacious, affordable apartments, fresh air and virtually no crime. The people are friendly, with a unity rare in other Israeli communities.

It sounds like a delightful place, and in many ways it is. However, there is one catch. The name of this pretty little town is Sderot.

Although many people have not even heard of the place, those who are familiar with it know that Sderot, just over the border from Gaza, has hostile neighbours. Terrorists have besieged the town with Qassam rockets for the past eight years, killing and wounding dozens of people and terrorizing many more. Many residents have left, no longer able to bear the constant fear, the 15-second warning siren to run to a bomb shelter, their children being unable to walk safely to school or the park, and businesses closing down. The people who remain often have no choice, as they are unable to sell their homes.

Yet, some decide to stay on, despite everything. One woman, a nurse, explained that she has lived in Sderot for the past 11 years and will remain, because "there is no place like home."

Recently, via Connections Israel, an Israeli solidarity organization, a group of us visited Sderot. When we first arrived, we saw the parking lot of the police station, piled high with the ugly pieces of metal that were Qassam rockets. Then, as we walked past the fire station, the warning siren went off. We were told to crouch down on the floor for a few moments until the all-clear signal came, thus giving us a tiny hint of what daily life is like for the residents.

At the trauma centre, one of the staff explained how victims are treated.

From the backyard of the centre we viewed a strange sight – bus shelters that had been removed from all over town and left there. Unlike in other communities, the bus shelters in Sderot needed to be replaced by concrete bomb shelters.

Just as we were about to leave, another siren went off and we were quickly herded back inside the trauma centre. A teenage girl was brought in, crying and in shock. At that moment, she symbolized for us all the trauma victims of the town.

We met a man who chose to live in Sderot, part of a 150-member group called Doresh-Tov, who came to the town to show their support in the most tangible way possible.

Stepping into the backyard of his office building, we viewed the field where Qassam rockets often explode. Apartment buildings, houses and a school all surround this "open field," which is how it is described by the media, implying that there is no threat to the residents.

Then we saw his family home, where his children were playing in the backyard. A family backyard, like so many others; yet, next to the rabbit hutch and children's toys stood the frightening remains of a Qassam rocket.

Nearby, we visited a new synagogue, created in a former store in an abandoned shopping centre. Congregation Doresh-Tov envisions a communal spiritual centre here, with Ashkenazi, Sephardi and Ethiopian synagogues, as well as recreation and play areas for all the children. The goal is to strengthen the connections for all the neighbourhood residents and enable the children to play "normally," like children everywhere.

The next stop was a poignant one – we went to see the memorial stone of two small Ethiopian children killed by a Qassam rocket while playing outside their homes on a quiet residential street. At a different time, another four-year-old boy had been killed on the way to his daycare centre with his mother, who had waited 10 long years to have a child. Ten years and one terrible moment – and then her precious little boy was gone.

At the outskirts of the town, we observed just how close the border to Gaza really is, a mere two kilometres away. We could also see the smokestacks of the city of Ashkelon, which is now, unfortunately, within Qassam range too.

Returning to the centre of town, we distributed the Chanukah gift baskets Connections Israel had arranged for the residents, the most enjoyable part of our whole visit. The residents were surprised and delighted to receive the gifts, but just as important to them was the knowledge that Jews around the world care.

We bought snacks and lunch from the small stores still struggling to survive here, despite the odds. Everyone thanked us for coming to give them support. And we in turn thanked them for being there – for all of us.

Just before we left, we saw an abandoned playground destroyed by a Qassam, with just the small, broken piece of a children's slide still remaining. But then, on the side of a bomb shelter, we read the triumphant words, "Am Yisrael Chai!" (The Jewish People Live!) And yes, we do, even in the brave, besieged little town named Sderot.

For more information on how you can show your support for the courageous people of Sderot by helping them build their community centre, please visit the website: www.connectionsisrael.com.

In analysis, context is everything

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

On Dec. 29, two days after Israel launched its assault on Gaza, both the Globe and Mail and the New York Times presented what appeared to be much the same story. Both were front-page reports and both were presented as "analysis." But there the similarity ended.

Under the headline "Shock and Awe," the Globe and Mail's Patrick Martin argued that Israel is engaged in an effort to reassert its regional deterrence following what has been widely judged as the failure of the 2006 war against Hezbollah in Lebanon. Martin, however, struck a one-sided, judgmental tone: "Israel's massive assault on the militant Hamas organization in the Gaza Strip shook the Middle East this weekend. Few people expected Israel to deal such a blow, with such carnage, against a group whose repeated rocket attacks posed no existential threat to the powerful country."

Martin is wrong. The threat exists, and it's very real. In 2008 alone, nearly 3,000 rockets and mortars were fired from Gaza onto Israel's southern communities, terrorizing the civilians there and forcing many to live in or flee repeatedly to underground shelters. Even during the six-month "truce" between Israel and Hamas in the second half of 2008, the rocket fire continued, albeit on a much reduced scale of "only" three or four missiles every few days. This shelling had prompted Israel to temporarily close the crossings that allowed shipment of food and humanitarian supplies to Gaza's civilians.

When Hamas refused to renew the truce in mid-December, and then defiantly and dramatically accelerated the firing of rockets into Israel, Israel's leaders continued to exercise restraint.

Also unstated by Martin was the fact that Hamas used the truce period to smuggle Iranian-supplied long-range Katyushas and Grad rockets through tunnels from Egypt into Gaza. This increased both the range of Hamas' rocket punch to enable them to reach places in central Israel such as Yavne and the outskirts of Be'er Sheva, and the lethal power of each barrage.

On the issue of deterrence, Martin quoted and paraphrased Mark Heller of Tel Aviv University's Institute for National Security Studies: "'A big reason for this operation' isn't to wipe out Hamas or even to instil 'quiet' in southern Israel; 'it's to restore credibility in Israel's ability to deter enemies.'"

The impression lingered that if this was one reason for the assault, there were others that Martin failed to mention.

By contrast, in "With Strikes, Israel Reminds Foes It Has Teeth," the New York Times' Ethan Bronner made it clear, from his opening paragraph, that in addition to wanting to reassert its deterrence capacity, "Israel's military operation is aimed primarily at forcing Hamas to end its rocket barrages and military buildup."

He then went on to quote a senior Israeli military official, saying that Israel's aim is "to stop the firing against our civilians in the south and shape a different and new security situation there."

The implication was that not only is deterrence a reasonable justification for the assault, the protection of civilians is of even greater value.

Strikingly, Martin had evidently considered only an existential threat as a justification for war. In so doing, he disregarded and even denigrated the dangers hundreds of thousands of Israelis had been facing for eight years, since the first rocket was fired from Gaza into Israel.

Bronner wrote that "hundreds" were killed in Gaza. However, he noted that Israel was aiming at "devastating Hamas' resources," not at committing "carnage."

He went on to make it clear that Israel had approached its task methodically: "The Israeli military had mapped out Hamas bases, training camps and missile storage houses and systematically hit them simultaneously in an Israeli version of 'shock and awe,' the sudden delivery of overwhelming force" that led to the deaths of "scores of Hamas men." Indeed, Israel has made every effort to avoid harming Gaza's civilians, even though Hamas deliberately hides its military assets in their midst.

Like Martin, Bronner quoted Heller about Israel's attempts to assert its deterrence. But it's very clear in the context of Bronner's piece that deterrence is secondary to the immediate goal of eliminating the Hamas threat to Israel's southern communities. Context is everything. Bronner's piece alone provided it.

Oil industry insider predicts future energy crisis

By ADRIANNE FITCH
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — Canada could become the next energy superpower by exploiting its vast oil sand deposits, an industry insider said recently.

However, a lack of leadership, efficiency and engineering expertise have inflated mining costs and held the industry back, said Sam Spanglet, a former vice-president of Oil Sands Shell and a former president of Albian Sands.

Spanglet, born in Germany and educated in Israel, spoke to about 30 Vancouver business executives last month at a luncheon at the Terminal City Club. The luncheon was part of the Albert Einstein Business Forums, hosted by the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University (CFHU) of Jerusalem. Co-chaired by alumni Gary Segal and Randy Milner, the forums were created to highlight the connection between science and business at Hebrew U.

Spanglet said that a recent drop in oil prices, from $147 to $40 a barrel within three months, was a sign of short-sightedness and economic panic.

"It was an overreaction – the world hasn't changed that much. Destruction of supply is what's really going on. Oil is a finite product, and every-day the world produces less than the day before. I believe we are setting ourselves up for a huge supply destruction."

Economic panic has stopped development in oil exploration, further endangering supply, Spanglet noted. Declining gas prices encourage waste, as drivers hop back into their SUVs and Cadillacs, and harm the environment, he said.

"It's easy to blame big industry for the environment. But as individuals we are less responsible to the environment than oil companies. We are very selfish. We don't think three months in advance – we only think about yesterday and today."

Spanglet added that while we have information about oil reserves in North America, all we know about Saudi Arabia and the Gulf States is what they tell us. "If you want to believe them, be my guest," he said. "I believe their oil reserves are far less than what they claim."

Given the probability of an impending energy crisis, Canada is poised to become a huge player in the oil business, said Spanglet. Northern Alberta's oil sands contain more than 350 billion barrels of crude oil, second only to Saudi Arabia's reserves.

The advantage to oil sand mining is that deposits are visible at ground level, eliminating the financial risk of exploration, Spanglet said.

Disadvantages are the huge financial and environmental costs of drilling, pumping and treating the thick, viscous oil (also known as bitumen), separating it from sand and converting it into usable fuel, he said.

Mining, processing and construction costs are out of control, said Spanglet, because of bad management and a lack of leadership, efficiency and engineering competency.

He said Canada's oil industry has been lax in rewarding excellence and punishing poor performance. "Most of the workers hate to perform badly – they want to be successful. But leadership is not doing their part."

Answers to environmental and economic challenges may very well lie in scientific research, a top priority for the Hebrew U. The university's four campuses conduct 43 per cent of Israel's biotechnology research and more than one-third of its academic scientific research overall.

Hebrew U ranks fourth in academic research institution in the Asia-Pacific region and 65th worldwide. Because of the university's excellence, Israel is ranked 12th worldwide in academic research.

What does that mean for business?

In 2007, Hebrew U's revenues of $51 million were comparable to those of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology's revenues of $61 million and Stanford University's revenues of $50 million. Hebrew U's net research budget is $107 million, while MIT's is $1.2 billion and Stanford's is $1 billion.

Hebrew U's scientific achievements include:

• Exelon, an FDA-approved drug for treating Alzheimer's disease and dementia. (2007 sales were $632 million.)

• Doxil, an anti-cancer drug with an innovative delivery system. (2007 sales were $417 million.)

• Drip irrigation techniques that increase food crop production while decreasing water consumption.

• Mobile Eye, an advanced vision-based driver-assistance system that prevents accidents. (2007 valuation was $600 million.)

• Cherry tomato, the world's most popular cocktail hybrid for greenhouse production. (2007 sales were $73 million)

Dina Wachtel, the executive director of CFHU's western region, said that the Einstein business forums aim to help publicize Hebrew U's enormous contributions to both science and business.

In 1925, Einstein was one of the founders of the Hebrew U, she said. Einstein served on Hebrew University's first board of governors, delivered its inaugural scientific lecture and edited its first collection of scientific papers.

Edmonton's new rabbi follows in parents' footsteps

By IRENA KARSHENBAUM
Special to The CJN

EDMONTON — It's probably safe to say that being a rabbi is not on the career list of most little girls, but Rabbi Carmit Harari says she came to the decision honestly.

When she was four, her father was in one of the first graduating classes of the Israeli rabbinical program at Hebrew Union College in Jerusalem, and her mother was a Jewish educator.

"I grew up in the field," she said.

What made it more remarkable is that when Rabbi Harari, now 31, was living in Israel and in her first year of rabbinical studies, her mother applied to the same program – part of Hebrew Union College – and both mother and daughter were ordained as rabbis within a few months of each other.

Rabbi Harari is now serving Edmonton's Temple Beth Ora, a 90-family congregation that was founded 29 years ago.

Her parents live in a suburb of Chicago where her father is a full-time rabbi, and from which her mother commutes to a congregation in Jackson, Tenn., where she is a part-time rabbi.

Rabbi Harari is the third female rabbi to serve the Edmonton congregation in the past 12 years.

"The congregation was looking for the best rabbi to serve its needs. I've never experienced anything negative in that I am a woman," she said.

She said that since she started in September, she has taken on a full range of responsibilities in addition to her rabbinical duties. She is teaching adult Jewish education courses and teaching in a day school, is involved in various interfaith activities and working with the other congregations in Edmonton.

Through her work, she said, she hopes "to bring meaning to people's Jewish experience."

For the Haifa-born rabbi, coming to Edmonton has most certainly been a long journey, but one she has adapted to well.

"I grew up being exposed to a plethora of Jewish experiences. I felt very comfortable coming here.

"My congregation has a tag line, 'traditional values, contemporary focus,' that in a nutshell can typify my feelings. That's why I connected almost immediately with the congregation, and with the Reform movement in North America."

Montreal-area shul celebrates 50 years

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — At one time, there were three simchahs nearly every weekend at the Young Israel of Chomedey Synagogue, usually a couple of bar mitzvahs and a wedding.

Today, the shul is home to a couple of seniors clubs, and bingo isn't held there anymore because of the no-smoking law.

In its heyday in the 1960s through to the mid-1970s, the Young Israel had nearly 900 members, and was a bustling place. Now there are 275 names on its roster, and about half of these people do not live in the area anymore.

A few stalwarts such as president Jerry Baranoff and longtime member Nathan Yacowar devote themselves to keeping the 50-year-old synagogue going.

Down but not out, the congregation is still in the mood to party. Yacowar is heading the anniversary celebrations, which will culminate in a gala dinner on Aug. 30 at the synagogue. He is extending invitations to all past members or descendants of members, as well as the many others who were touched by the Young Israel, to attend.

The Young Israel was founded by 30-odd young families from the city that settled in the new suburban development attracted by its cheaper housing prices and wide-open spaces. The area, on the southwest of Ile-Jésus, was then known as St. Martin, the unlikely location of what would become a thriving Jewish community.

The municipality of Chomedey would come into existence in 1961, as a result of a merger, and then be incorporated into the new city of Laval in 1965.

"We were the 12 and 5 crowd – the average bungalow went for $12,500," said Yacowar, who has been a Young Israel member since 1959.

Initially called the Jewish Congregation of St. Martin, the synagogue's first home of its own was a bungalow on Romiti Street and the first president was Joseph Spector. The basement served as the daily and Shabbat chapel, while the upstairs was used for a nursery, kindergarten and afternoon Hebrew school.

The community grew so rapidly that it soon became obvious the little house would not do for much longer. Although they were struggling to pay their own mortgages, the members pledged $100,000 to build a synagogue on its current site on Elizabeth Boulevard and hired a rabbi, Solomon Spiro, from Yeshiva University, who would remain with the congregation for 33 years.

The building was completed in 1961, and the congregation joined the Zionist-oriented Orthodox Young Israel movement.

The community was growing so rapidly that by the time the synagogue was finished it was already too small, and an auditorium was completed four years later. The current sanctuary was added in 1972.

Matisyahu, who recently spent a morning at Hillel's Wolfond Centre at U of T just hours before performing a concert, told students he feels a responsibility to represent core Jewish values through his music [Daniel Abramson and Jon Cohen photos]

Matisyahu dropped into Hillel to eat, pray and talk about living a Jewish life

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Since he successfully made the unlikely crossover of reggae and hip hop with traditional Jewish themes, Matisyahu, who has been a source of pride for the Jewish community since he burst onto the music scene in 2004, said he feels a responsibility to represent Judaism through his music.

"Basically, God gives you different opportunities and God gave me the opportunity to make music and not have to do anything else besides that so I feel like I have a responsibility to create music that is spiritual and representative of the core Jewish values," said Matisyahu, who was in Toronto last month on the last leg of his North American tour.

Matisyahu rose to international fame in 2006 with the release of his second album, Youth, which peaked at number 4 on the Billboard 200 and has sold more than one million copies.

And to the delight of about 40 students, the six-foot-four Orthodox reggae superstar came to Hillel of Greater Toronto's Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life for a shacharit service, a brunch and a Q and A, just hours before he took the stage at the Phoenix Concert Theatre in Toronto .

"I got tired of davening all the time on the back of a tour bus in hotels and stuff like that. I felt that if I could get a minyan and daven everyday it would be healthy for me, spiritually," said Matisyahu, who indulged the gathering by answering questions about his life, his music and his spirituality, after taking some time to schmooze with the students while snacking on party sandwiches and orange juice.

On his journey from a secular Jewish upbringing in White Plains, N.Y. as Matthew Paul Miller, to a high school dropout who followed rock band Phish across the United States on a tour while experimenting with drugs, to a meeting with a rabbi who introduced him to a world of religious spirituality, it seems like the long, lean, and bearded 29-year-old musician has managed to stay true to his free-spirited, uninhibited self.

"My life is more that of a religious Jew than a celebrity in the sense that I always had my fantasies of what I thought a celebrity's life would be like and my life is not like that at all," he said.

"I'm married, I have kids, and I kind of have a religious lifestyle even when I'm on the road... I never really get too separated from [Judaism]. I feel it keeps me grounded."

> 'I always had my fantasies of what I thought a celebrity's life would be like and my life is not like that at all'

Matisyahu, who was on tour with his wife and two kids and was spending his nights in Toronto with his wife's grandmother who lives in the city, didn't always feel a connection to Judaism.

He said that as a child, he was sent to Hebrew school, but couldn't relate to it.

"Being told that this is what Judaism is and that when you go to Hebrew school you have to conform to this... When you're a kid there is a psychological process of separation, of pulling away and then figuring out the world on your own terms," he said.

"I found along the way... in Judaism, there are so many aspects and elements and differing philosophies and ideas and ways of expressing those within the Jewish context. So for me, it was about trying to figure out where I thought my identity or my truth lies within Judaism."

He added that he didn't start exploring his Jewish heritage until he took his first trip to Israel.

"When I was 16, I went to Israel and that was a jumping off point for me. When I started to become religious when I was about 20 or 21, I was in college and that was when I also really started to explore Judaism. I don't know if [this] is what made it unique for me or what made a big difference for me, but I've never been able to explore things from just a purely intellectual place, objectively or separately. I've always somehow pulled it in my actual life."

For example, he said that when he wanted to learn what Shabbat was about, he wanted to experience Shabbat by observing it, rather than just read about the concept of it.

And when he is on the road, he makes sure to schedule his tour dates around Shabbat and Jewish holidays because he can observe wherever he goes.

"Let's say we're at Bonnaroo, a music festival in Tennessee, and I'm playing on Saturday and Sunday," Matisyahu said.

"I call my friends, I get like six of my friends to come down, we get a Torah, we get food, we get permission, we set up a big tent and we invite whoever wants to come. We get two-, three-, four- 500 people. We did one where there was this huge storm in the middle of the night and... people's tents were being blown away, so they came to the Shabbos tent. The tent was overflowing with people on all kinds of hallucinogens at like 4:00 a.m. I was asleep, but the rabbi told me," he said with a laugh.

With music and religion such a significant part of his adolescence, Matisyahu said the connection between the two came to him naturally.

"In terms of a connection between reggae and Judaism, reggae music... takes ideas from the Old Testament and puts them to music," he said.

"It is able to bring out certain ideas from Judaism and portray them in a way that is extremely powerful. That was one of my initial draws to reggae music and everything that goes along with it, and being 14 years old and listening to Bob Marley."

Matisyahu's third album, Light, is scheduled to be released in March.

Go from your strengths and have a fantastic year!

Life Coach Corner
Judy Siblin-Librach

If you want this to be your best year ever, I have a couple of ideas you can add to your tool kit to start the year off in a spectacular new way.

For one thing, have the intention to begin anew and silence the "yeah, buts" that creep into your heart and mind. Believe that you have a fresh page, and write the script of what would make this your best year ever.

Then begin by thinking of the activity that energizes you and draws you in, the one you would do for free, that makes you excited and nervous, and in spite of that, it's the one you continuously feel a pull toward doing.

A fascinating new book by Marcus Buckingham, Go Put Your Strengths To Work: 6 Powerful Steps to Achieve Outstanding Performance, is the perfect way to carve out a brilliant new way of becoming happy and successful in your life, your work and your contribution to the world. The premise of Buckingham's book is that he teaches you to push yourself toward activities that strengthen you and avoid those that drag you down and drain you.

"You will grow the most in your areas of greatest strength. Your strengths magnify you," he writes.

A typical scenario in a job performance evaluation is that two minutes are spent talking about what you did really well. The remaining 58 minutes deal with your weaknesses. Ironically, when you focus on your strengths, or your employees' strengths, and begin from that vantage point, chances of extraordinary success are much greater.

There is an incredible example in the book where Buckingham writes about a brilliant swimmer, Matt Borden, who was blessed with the ability to swim like a "human fish." He won multiple awards and events ranging from sprints to long-distance relays. The problem was, he began to loathe swimming, was having terrible migraine headaches, and had stopped feeling any joy when he entered a swimming pool. He was surprised something he was so good at made him feel so bad. But there was something else Matt loved, which was playing guitar and writing music.

He gave up swimming and pursued his passion for music, and now he is a successful and very happy music producer who owns a studio in California.

The formula in the book for finding out what your strengths are uses the acronym SIGN.

S is for success, Buckingham says, and refers to something that makes you feel recharged and creative, where the activity fulfils and sustains and energizes you – never drains you.

The I is for instinct, and your strengths have "an I-can't-help-but" quality to them. You can't quite articulate why, but you find yourself drawn to certain activities repeatedly, even though you may be just a little scared of them: "Maybe I'm not good enough, maybe I'll fail." But in spite of that, you still feel a pull toward them.

G is for growth. You feel "happiness and focus. It feels easy. It feels like you're not trying very hard. It's the activity you want to practise, to read up on, to refine with new tricks and techniques to grow. You feel challenged. You are lost in the activity for a long time."

N is for needs, and instead of feeling psychologically drained after the activity, you feel "fulfilled, powerful, restored, the exact opposite of drained."

So the book attempts to help you as the reader capture, clarify and confirm what your strengths are.

The author suggests a great exercise – you carry around a notebook for the next week, with the following instructions: every time you find yourself doing something that makes you feel one of the strength adjectives, write down what the activity was.

So the strength words are "powerful, confident, natural, smooth, on fire, high, I've got this wired, great, authentic, that was easy, awesome and when can I do this again?"

Then do the same for the weakness words, which are "drained, time's going by so slowly, I can't concentrate, frustrated, wiped out, forced, I'm getting a migraine, how much longer?, irritated, bored, why can't the new guy do this?"

You will know very quickly which activities energize you and which drain you.

I wish you all that you will get more engaged in your strengths this year and move toward that which makes you feel awake, alive, happy, excited and in your bliss.

Wishing you all a very happy and healthy new year. I do think it's going to be your best year ever!

Pursuing additional child support

Family Matters
by John Syrtash
B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.
Counsel
Garfin Zeidenberg LLP
Family Lawyer & Mediator for 26 years

Question: Last year my ex and I agreed to terms of separation which included (nominal) child support arrangements and access. The agreement was handwritten by me and signed by both of us, but not witnessed. He agreed to pay half the cost of a divorce if I declined to go after additional support. The agreement was never filed with the courts and the application for divorce has not been filed yet either. Are these legally binding documents or can I pursue additional support?

Answer: You can definitely pursue additional support. A domestic contract, such as a separation agreement, cohabitation agreement, or marriage contract is only enforceable if it is made in writing, signed by both parties and witnessed. Even then, if the amount of child support you agreed upon did not follow the Child Support Guidelines, then a court may not be obliged to enforce the agreement, unless it is given good reason to do so. The Guidelines provide for basic monthly child support and special or "extraordinary" payments for extras based on your income as compared to your partner's. The basic "table" amount payable is determined by a chart found on the internet or in booklets from the government. The basic "table: monthly payment" is determined by (a) the gross pre-tax yearly income of the non-custodial parent, and is usually found at line 150 of his tax return; (b) the number of dependent children the parents have between them; and (c) the province in which the paying spouse resides.

For instance, if your Ontario husband earns $50,000 gross in 2004, then for one child the grid for child support under the Guidelines shows that he should be paying $429. If you have daycare / nanny or other "extra" expenses of $1,000 monthly and earn 25 percent of your total combined gross incomes (i.e. yours plus your ex husband's), then he would pay an additional $750 monthly and you would pay the remaining $250.

The same formula applies to orthodontics, summer camp, post-secondary tuition, non-OHIP healthcare and some extracurricular activities like hockey. But half the cost of an uncontested divorce is about $750. It's nothing to worry about, especially if your signatures weren't witnessed. Also if you didn't have a Certificate of Independent Legal Advice from your own lawyer before you signed, along with full financial disclosure from your husband/partner, then the whole agreement is completely unenforceable on those grounds alone.

Both the CTV and the Toronto Star reported police presence at the demonstration, but no hostilities.

Though he couldn't confirm numbers, Meir Weinstein, the JDL's national director, said he believed his group was able to get somewhere between 250 and 300 people to Saturday's protest to show solidarity with Israel, and it organized an "emergency" meeting late Sunday to streamline his organization's response to growing pro-Palestinian activities in the city and to cobble together more volunteers for future protests.

"We had over 50 Israeli flags there and many more people not holding flags," he said. "We're looking for faster mobilization so we can have greater numbers at upcoming protests."

Asked whether the latest protests were different than initial ones his group attended last week, Weinstein said he'd noticed a more intense "anti-Jewish" sentiment among the pro-Palestinian contingent.

"We hear people chanting 'The ovens weren't big enough!' 'Death to Jews,' 'Slaughter the Jews,' and Israeli flags are being burned," he said, adding that the JDL advised its supporters "not to engage" directly with pro-Palestinian demonstrators.

Israel's backers should "just stand up for Israel. Wave your flag if you have one and support Israel to go all the way," Weinstein said.

In Montreal on Sunday, about 5,000 people marched against Israel's Gaza offensive, calling on the Harper government to change its position in support of Israel.

The three-hour event was noisy, but police reported no incidents.

The demonstration began at Cabot Square, at the corner of Atwater and Ste. Catherine streets, and proceeded to the Israeli consulate in Westmount Square and on to Phillips Square.

The most well-known speaker was newly elected MNA Amir Khadir, co-leader of the new Québec Solidaire party, who said: "The Palestinian people as well as the Israeli people are taken hostage by the situation of violence…

"The Israeli military has ruled Israel for 50 years and has interests in maintaining war and violence," he added.

"In Israel there is an elite, political and military, that benefits from instability and war… [Prime Minister Stephen] Harper is just playing the game of these military rulers by blindly supporting the Israeli government."

Khadir also took part in two earlier, much smaller, demonstrations, including one Jan. 2 where Israel's "apartheid" was denounced, as well as another on Dec. 28 where Khadir is reported to have said that both Palestinians and Israelis are victims of the "warmongering policies of the Zionist state."

The Quebec-Israel Committee (QIC) said it was troubled by the "hateful character" of the demonstration, noting that there were repeated calls for the "murder of Jews" made in Arabic ("al-mawt al-Yahud").

In addition, an Israeli flag was set on fire in front of the Israeli consulate.

"The violent and anti-Semitic rhetoric of numerous demonstrators echoes the radical Islamic speech that plagues the Middle East and has no place in Quebec and flouts the civic values of Quebec society," QIC executive director Luciano Del Negro said in a statement.

In a statement Sunday, Frank Dimant, B'nai Brith Canada's executive vice president, defended Israel's continued operations in Gaza and exhorted the international community to "follow Canada's principled stance" on the situation by recognizing Hamas as the instigator of the conflict.

"For years, the terrorist group Hamas has ruthlessly and deliberately targeted Israel's civilian population," he said. "No sovereign state can stand idly by and allow a terrorist group to launch rockets against its citizens with impunity, nor allow it the means to re-arm and enhance its weapons capability, as has been the case with Hamas ever since Israel unilaterally evacuated the area."

Speaking to The CJN on Monday, Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) – who witnessed the weekend demonstration in Ottawa – said his organization had alerted officials about the disturbing "tone and substance" of the rhetoric being chanted at protests across the country.

"The kind of language being used, 'Death to the Jews,' is the kind we haven't heard since the [start of the second intifadah] in 2000," he said. "The common element is support for Hamas, but nothing akin to genuine concern for the plight of Palestinians living under Hamas."

Fogel said CIC has worked hard to explain Israel's situation and expressed gratitude to all Canadian political parties for recognizing that Hamas is "the root" of the problem and the "immediate precipitant" of the Israeli offensive.

He said the Canadian political sector understands "pretty much unanimously" that Israel "could no longer accept or tolerate the chronic launching of missiles" against its citizenry.

Fogel added: "Israel had the obligation to respond, lest Hamas and others begin to contemplate that there was a new threshold of tolerance for the kind of terror they author.

"But larger than that… the reactions that are coming forward from the Arab world [show] they have drawn the conclusion that Israel is no longer the real enemy. The fight has moved from an Arab-Israeli conflict to one of extremism versus Arab nationalism. What they are saying, all of them quietly, some of them less quietly, including Saudi Arabia and Egypt, Jordan and Morocco, even [Palestinian Authority President] Mahmoud Abbas… they're saying 'We can't make common cause with Islamic extremism as defined and exported through Iran.' That relates to Hamas, Hezbollah and things happening in southeast Asia."

Abbas has said that Hamas could have prevented Israel's attack on Gaza and has called on it to renew its ceasefire with Israel.

Nationwide rallies in support of Israel have been scheduled for this evening to show support for Israel's southern cities, whose citizens have been targets of Hamas rockets for the past eight years.

In Toronto, the rally will be held at the Beth Tzedec Syragogue, at 1700 Bathurst St., as a joint effort by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy, Canadian Jewish Congress, the CIC and the Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee.

In Montreal, Federation CJA will hold its rally at the Beth Israel Beth Aaron Congregation, at 6800 Mackle Rd.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Musical production raises funds for Feed the Children

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

When Mark Wise, chair of the board of Canadian Feed the Children, first asked Elan Panov and Brian Hartman to start a branch of the non-profit organization at the University of Western Ontario (UWO), the two science students eagerly accepted the challenge.

From left, Brian Hartman and Elan Panov, co-presidents of the Canadian Feed the Children chapter at University of Western Ontario, are holding a fundraiser that will premier the show The Facebook Musical, written and directed by Jonathan Blankenstein, who is seated at the piano.

"It was an opportunity for us to get involved with a charity that does international development work," says Panov, noting that Feed the Children offers social and economic assistance to communities living in poverty.

The students, both now in second year, took a year to learn about university life before launching the new campus charity.

"We didn't want to jump into anything in first year," Panov explains.

In the fall of 2008, he and Hartman signed up 120 members for the UWO branch of Canadian Feed the Children.

"We were amazed by the interest, especially for the first year of the club."

Now the campus is buzzing about the charity's major fundraising event.

Panov and Hartman's friend Jonathan Blankenstein – also a UWO student and their former classmate from the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, Richmond Hill campus – has written an original Broadway-style production, The Facebook Musical, as a fundraiser for Canadian Feed the Children. It will debut at the McManus Theatre in London, Ont., on Jan. 18.

When the two founding co-presidents spoke to Blankenstein about their plans for the charity, he offered to write a musical for a fundraiser, Panov says.

"The script is amazing. It's very funny. It applies to everyday student life at the university," says Hartman, who can hardly contain his enthusiasm and passion for the charity and the show.

This passion dates back to high school, he says. "I was very active in various charities. I was the chair of fundraising at CHAR [TanenbaumChat's Richmond Hill campus] for two consecutive years."

He says the organizational work that went into setting up Feed the Children on campus was also an invaluable learning opportunity.

"I loved the challenge of starting a chapter of a charity from the ground-floor."

Hartman explains that much of the legwork for starting the chapter was done the year before.

"When I was the president of first-year students at Hillel, I had to meet with the university student council. I learned the system. My forte was doing this legwork.

"Elan and I complement each other's talent."

He says his responsibilities as the producer of the show have included finding a show venue, organizing volunteers, arranging ticket sales, publicizing the show and helping with the actual production.

"Being involved in the creative end of the fundraiser is a terrific outlet for me and other people involved."

Hartman says they first publicized the event – where else? – on Facebook.

"We broke the news on Dec. 17. When people heard about the idea, they demanded tickets."

Hartman has lots of praise for the show's creator.

"Jonathan is amazing to work with. He really is in a league of his own in terms of talent, intelligence and kindness. For a student of his age to write an original musical is unheard of. That's what makes him so special.

"We jokingly say he's a Renaissance man. He has the highest average in science, but music is his passion and the charity is the beneficiary. It's terrific how generous he is. He's a great friend and a great human being."

Blankenstein, for his part, says he is happy to donate his talent and time to the fundraiser, adding that his father Eric, a pianist and entrepreneur, is the show's co-sponsor.

The second-year science student says his goal is to become a Broadway composer.

"The Facebook Musical is an exploration of first-year university. I was aiming for an impactful piece that people of my generation can relate to."

Blankenstein shares Hartman and Panov's enthusiasm for the upcoming fundraiser.

"It's a win-win situation for all of us. I look forward to doing these shows, and what better way to do a show than with your friends, for charity."

Egypt to demand Hamas accept immediate truce

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspapers Ltd.

CAIRO — Egyptian officials said Monday that Cairo was set to demand an immediate ceasefire from Hamas in the Gaza Strip, as Israeli forces moved into their 10th day of a military offensive on the coastal territory.

Hamas planned to send a delegation to Egypt on Monday for the first diplomatic talks since the launch of a 10-day-old Israel Defence Forces offensive in Gaza, an official of the Islamist group has said.

Hamas official Ayman Taha said a Hamas delegation would head to Cairo "answering an Egyptian invitation to hold discussions." A senior Palestinian official said on Friday that Egypt had launched contacts with Hamas to reach a truce.

The Hamas visit to Egypt would coincide with the expected visit there of French President Nicolas Sarkozy, who has also launched a European-backed diplomatic push for a ceasefire. Taha didn't say whether the delegation would include Hamas members from Gaza or elsewhere.

Meanwhile, Turkey's Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan on Monday accused Israel of committing "inhuman" acts in Gaza that would cause it to self-destruct.

In an interview with Al-Jazeera television, Erdogan said Israel hurt its relations with Turkey by attacking Gaza and will be punished.

Israel launched a ground offensive deep into Gaza on Saturday in an effort to stop rocket attacks from the Hamas-controlled strip, which have traumatized southern Israel. More than 500 Palestinians have been killed since the operation began, at least a quarter of them civilians, a UN agency said.

In the wake of his visit to the Middle East on Monday, Erdogan voiced his support of Hamas and said Turkey would act as a mediator between the Islamist organization and the United Nations Security Council. He further stressed that Israel was responsible for violating the six-month ceasefire with Hamas by keeping the coastal strip blockaded.

UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon on Monday urged the divided Security Council to work toward a speedy end to the escalating crisis in Gaza, and he planned to meet Monday with Arab ministers flying to New York to press for an immediate halt to the violence.

Late Saturday, the United States blocked approval of a Security Council statement calling for an immediate ceasefire and expressing serious concern at the escalation of violence after Israeli tanks and artillery began a ground assault on Hamas-ruled Gaza, council diplomats said.

In a statement released Sunday, Ban said: "Given the crucial juncture at which we have arrived in the search for a ceasefire, I appeal to all members of the international community to display the unity and commitment required to bring this escalating crisis to an end."

On Sunday, Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas denounced Israel's ground operation as "brutal aggression."

Smoke billows from a tunnel in Rafah on Gaza's border with Egypt following an Israeli air strike on the area on Dec. 28. Jets bombed a series of tunnels on the Gaza-Egypt border — a lifeline for Hamas used for smuggling in goods and weapons into the enclave, which has been virtually sealed by Israel since the Islamists violently seized power in June 2007. [Abed Rahim Khatib / FLASH90 photo]

Gaza invasion 'defensive,' EU says

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspapers Ltd.

PRAGUE — The Czech Republic, which holds the European Union presidency, said Saturday that the Israeli ground offensive in Gaza is a defensive action.

"At the moment, from the perspective of the last days, we understand this step as a defensive, not offensive, action," Czech EU presidency spokesperson Jiri Potuznik said.

Czech Foreign Minister Karel Schwarzenberg was scheduled to lead an EU delegation to the region Sunday, and Potuznik said the presidency will wait to see the results of that visit.

Israel sent troops into Gaza on Saturday evening, eight days after launching air strikes on the coastal strip, which came in the wake of a breakdown in a six-month truce with Gaza's Hamas rulers.

Dozens of rockets have been fired at Israel's southern communities over the past two weeks, killing four Israelis. The air strikes in Gaza have killed at least 420 Gazans, according to Palestinian reports.

U.S. President George W. Bush last Friday branded the Hamas rocket attacks on Israel an act of terror and outlined his own condition for a ceasefire in Gaza, saying no peace deal would be acceptable without monitoring to halt the flow of smuggled weapons to terrorist groups.

Wounded Palestinians get medical care in Israel

By FADI EYADAT
and DANA VILER-POLLAK
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspapers Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Twelve Palestinians have been evacuated to Israel for medical treatment since Israel's Gaza operation began, as hospitals in Gaza strain to accommodate the hundreds of wounded.

For one Gaza boy, being treated in an Israeli hospital should increase his chances of making a full recovery.

About a two weeks ago, before the operation began, Sari Alsamana, 9, from Beit Hanoun was playing with his cousin outside his house in the northern Gaza town when a Qassam rocket fired by Gaza militants landed nearby, followed minutes later by an additional rocket strike in the same spot.

Both boys were seriously wounded and taken to Shifa Hospital in Gaza. As "Operation Cast Lead" was launched and the Israeli Air Force started bombing the strip, Sari was taken out of the hospital's intensive care unit as the facility began to overload with Gazans wounded in the air strikes.

Sari's condition began to worsen after he was taken out of the hospital, and the family treated him at home, hoping for his condition to improve. Later, they received a call from a clinic in their neighbourhood saying it may be possible for them to pass through the Erez Crossing in order to receive medical care in Israel.

"Now I know he is in good hands, that they will take care of him with devotion," Sari's father Mana said last Wednesday from the Tel Hashomer Hospital in Tel Aviv, where he is staying with his son until he recovers from his injuries.

"The atmosphere is different. It's America here. In Gaza there is nothing but fear, cold, hunger, and war," Mana added.

Sari's cousin was released from Shifa Hospital last week, despite being in critical condition.

"They have no room in the hospital. They released him, and he is likely to die," Mana said.

Last Wednesday, two additional Palestinian children were taken to Israel for treatment, including a seven-year-old with Down syndrome who suffered a head injury from an air force bomb dropped next to his house in Gaza. The boy's father was killed by the bomb, and his mother was wounded.

The boy is currently being treated at the Schneider Children's Hospital in Petach Tikvah, where he arrived in critical condition with serious injuries to his spinal cord and neck. His condition will be assessed again in the coming days.

Australians rally against Israel

JTA

SYDNEY, Australia — Thousands of pro-Palestinian demonstrators rallied in Australia against Israel's ground offensive in Gaza.

In Melbourne, about 2,000 anti-Israel protesters ground the city to a standstill Sunday as they marched from the State Library to Federation Square waving placards bearing slogans such as "Stop the Holocaust in Gaza" and "End the siege."

In Sydney, several streets in the central business district were blocked off as about 3,000 pro-Palestinian protesters marched to Town Hall carrying coffins draped in the Palestinian flag.

Speakers at both rallies blasted Prime Minister Kevin Rudd's Labor government for failing to condemn Israel's military invasion of Gaza. Also Sunday, about 150 pro-Israel supporters gathered on the steps of Parliament House in Melbourne, chanting "no more terror" and "free Gaza of Hamas." Among the speakers at the rally was Michael Danby, a Jewish member of Parliament in the Labor government.

Meanwhile in New Zealand, a weekly columnist for the New Zealand Herald accused Israel of ordering its soldiers to "slaughter and mutilate hundreds of citizens trapped on the Gaza Strip."

Matt McCarten in Sunday's edition wrote, "The Nazis used a similar policy during World War II in their occupied territories. The Israelis are getting the same results the Nazis got – their victims increase their hatred and determination to seek revenge."

Police made eight arrests during a demonstration by thousands against Israel in Berlin. Berlin's Jewish community also filed charges of incitement to hate based on posters displayed at a separate protest on Dec. 29.

An estimated 7,000 people turned out for Saturday's march, one of several held in European cities over the weekend protesting Israel's military operation in the Gaza Strip. In Berlin, some marchers demanded the right of return for Palestinians, referred to citizens in Gaza as prisoners, and charged Israel with blocking delivery of food and medicine.

Some clearly anti-Semitic posters were displayed, said Levi Salomon, who co-ordinates the task force against anti-Semitism for Berlin's Jewish community. Salomon told JTA he saw a family with small children holding a sign that read "Israelis are child murderers." Police arrested the adults at his urging, Salomon said, adding that what made the statement illegal was its condemnation of Israelis as a people.

Police spokesperson Michael Mass told JTA that while the demonstration was "for the most part peaceful," arrests were made on charges that included incitement to hate, breach of peace and violating the right to assembly, Mass said

Calling a demonstration peaceful gives the press and public "a false idea," Salomon said, and added that even some legal slogans "can be described as anti-Semitic." For example, Salomon said, he saw and heard slogans at recent demonstrations including "intifadah to the bitter end," "Israel mass murderer," "Zionists are fascists" and "Olmert is a murderer."

Salomon said he filed a suit in Berlin on Jan. 2 in connection with a demonstration four days earlier during which protesters were reported to be carrying signs reading "death to Israel" and "Juden Raus," or "kick out the Jews."

Authors & Poets

The CJN is pleased to announce its

Annual Passover Literary Supplement

We invite our readers to submit unpublished, original works of fiction or poetry that explore Jewish themes. Stories should not exceed 2,000 words.

We must receive your submissions no later than Friday, March 12. E-mail submissions are preferred, but works can also be sent by mail or brought to our office. E-mail: info@cjnews.com. Mail: 1500 Don Mills Rd., Suite 205, Toronto, Ont., M3B 3K4. Submissions will not be returned. Only writers whose work is chosen for publication will be contacted.

CJN Purim Art Contest

It's time again for our annual Purim Art Contest.

Who can enter: Children in grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN's 2009 Purim Poster. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However, they should not be too small nor too large. Please paint or draw bright, bold, colourful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. Please send us your name, address, phone number, age and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, Toronto, Ont., M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 3 p.m. on Tuesday, Feb. 17, 2009. We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen as the "winners." The judges will base their decisions on a number of factors such as: the use of colour, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The chances of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, February 20, 2009.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of March 5, 2009. Have fun and good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

Italian aid

Italy's Jewish community will send more than $400,000 (US) in medical supplies to aid children in both Israel and Gaza. The Rome Jewish Community and the umbrella Union of Italian Jewish Communities said their "gesture of humanity" will see half of the donation go to children and other civilians in Gaza "caught up in the targeted attacks on the Hamas terrorist infrastructure. The remaining half will go to children and civilians in southern Israel hit by Hamas rockets."

Holtzberg son dies

The son of a Chabad couple killed last month in Mumbai has died. Dov Holtzberg, the four-year-old son of Chabad emissaries Gavriel and Rivka Holtzberg, died of Tay-Sachs disease and was buried next to his parents and older brother. His brother died of the same illness two years ago. Dov had been living in a long-term care facility in Jerusalem.

IDF on YouTube

The Israeli army has opened a YouTube channel that displays footage of Gaza bombing raids. The Israel Defence Forces' International Press branch created the channel as part of its effort to win the war in the media.

The channel includes footage of pinpoint bombing operations in Gaza and other video clips of army operations, including aid distribution.

Tehran demonstration

Members of Iran's small Jewish community staged a demonstration outside of the UN office in Tehran, to protest the IDF's operations in the Gaza Strip.

The official Iranian news agency, IRNA, reported that community members, alongside Jewish parliamentarian Siamak Mara-Sedq, urged Israel to do its part to return quiet and security to the region. The chair of Iran's Jewish Union, Rahmatullah Raafi, said the community had come in support of the Palestinian people.

Israeli sources suspect the demonstration was organized by the government in Tehran and does not represent that actual stance of Iranian Jews. Some 25,000 Jews live in Iran.

Students rally

While some Israeli university students staged demonstrations in protest of the IDF's military campaign in the Gaza Strip, students in areas subject to an onslaught of Hamas rockets, including Ben-Gurion University (BGU) in Be'er Sheva and Sapir College in Sderot, fled in droves. Both BGU and Sapir announced classes were suspended indefinitely as a result of the continued rocket fire.

In Haifa, 400 students held two rallies, one in favour of the operation and one against, with the groups facing one another at the Technion.

Rightist students at Haifa University held a solidarity march supporting the operation in Gaza while left-wing students planned to hold a rally of their own, during which they would use stickers calling on the army to cease killing innocent civilians.

Meanwhile, hundreds of Tel Aviv University students held a rally in support of the residents of the south and the IDF operation.

Writers weigh in

Authors Amos Oz and A.B. Yehoshua say Hamas is responsible for the current outbreak of violence. Oz told the Italian newspaper Corriere della Sera the time has come for a complete ceasefire in exchange for Israel easing the blockade of the Gaza Strip.

Yehoshua wrote in La Stampa that "the Israeli operation was necessary, but also how quickly it needs to end.

"We need to normalize relations," he said.

Israeli troops divide Gaza

he said. "I asked myself and my ministerial colleagues if there was some other step, outlet or effort that we had not yet tried before sending our boys into a place fraught with such risks, from which some of them may not return.

"This morning I can look each one of you in the eyes and say that the government did its utmost before deciding on the operation. This operation was unavoidable."

Israeli troops in Gaza have divided the costal strip into two or three sections, according to reports, to prevent the transfer of weapons and terrorists from one sector to the other. Details of the operation have been embargoed by the military. Most reports are coming from Palestinian sources.

In the first night of the ground invasion, Israeli soldiers exchanged gunfire with Hamas terrorists as Israeli Air Force planes struck more than 45 targets, including tunnels, weapons storage facilities, and rocket- and shell-launching squads and platforms, according to a statement from the Israel Defence Forces spokesperson's office. The Israeli navy also targeted Hamas strongholds, including its intelligence headquarters in Gaza City.

During the cabinet meeting, military leaders took stock of Hamas' situation.

"Hundreds of terrorists have been killed, while weapons and ammunition stocks have been destroyed, along with tunnels and rocket manufacturing facilities," Military intelligence Chief Maj.-Gen. Amos Yadlin told the cabinet.

Yadlin said that the Hamas government is no longer functioning.

Some senior Hamas leaders are considering a move toward a ceasefire, Shin Bet security chief Yuval Diskin told government leaders.

Despite the ground attack, rockets and mortar shells continue to rain down on southern Israel – 36 hit the area Sunday morning and early afternoon. Several buildings were damaged and people lightly injured in the attacks. One rocket scored a direct hit on a home in Sderot Sunday, injuring one woman.

Some 400 rockets have struck Israel since the Gaza operation began.

The Israeli army says the ground operation is aimed at destroying Hamas' terrorist infrastructure and taking control of the areas from which rockets are being fired into Israel. A statement from the IDF spokesperson's office says the army has raised the level of alert for military forces in other areas of the country.

Olmert, Defence Minister Ehud Barak and Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni approved the ground incursion during a meeting Friday night.

"The decision to embark on the ground phase of the operation was taken following in-depth consideration," Barak said during an address to the nation and the media shortly after Israeli troops entered Gaza.

"We have carefully weighed all our options. We are not war hungry, but we shall not – I repeat, we shall not – allow a situation in which our towns, villages and civilians are constantly targeted by Hamas. It will not be easy or short, but we are determined."

Barak said Israel seeks peace.

"We have restrained ourselves for a long time, but now is the time to do what needs to be done," he said. "We are determined to afford our citizens what any citizen anywhere in the world is entitled to – peace, tranquillity and freedom from threats."

The IDF began calling up thousands of reservists on Saturday. The majority are from combat units, a large number are from the Homefront Command and some are from other supporting units, according to the IDF spokesperson's office.

On Saturday, the air force dropped leaflets in areas of Gaza urging residents to leave their homes, since the army would be operating in the area. Gaza residents complained in telephone interviews broadcast on CNN that the warnings were meaningless because they had nowhere else to go.

"Because of the terrorist actions carried out by some terrorist figures out of the area of residence against the State of Israel, the IDF was forced to immediately respond and act inside your area of residence," the leaflets read. "For your own safety, you are required to leave the area immediately."

The government has made it clear in several statements that it is not at war with the Palestinian civilians of Gaza, nor does it intend to retake the Gaza Strip.

"The IDF spokesperson wishes to reiterate that the residents of Gaza are not the target of the operation," read a statement issued Saturday shortly after the ground operation began. "Those who use civilians, the elderly, women and children as 'human shields' are responsible for any and all injury to the civilian population. Anyone who hides a terrorist or weapons in his house is considered a terrorist."

Israeli spokespeople have taken to the airwaves, from CNN to Al-Jazeera, to reiterate the message that it is working to reduce civilian casualties. Most Hamas infrastructure, however, is buried deep within civilian neighbourhoods, and Hamas has called on Palestinians to volunteer to serve as human shields, according to reports.

United Nations Secretary General Ban Ki-moon, in a phone call with Olmert shortly after the ground invasion began, called on Israel to pull out of Gaza and to cease all violence. The UN Security Council met for four hours on Saturday night and adjourned without producing a statement. The United States blocked a resolution calling for an immediate ceasefire and expressing concern about the escalation of violence in the area.

In Tel Aviv, hundreds of demonstrators took to the streets Saturday night both for and against the Gaza operation. In the Israeli Arab town of Sankhin, some 10,000 demonstrators protested the operation – one of the largest rallies held by Israeli Arabs in many years, according to reports. Several Arab Knesset members, as well as mayors of Arab towns and Arab community leaders, joined the protest.

Clarification

After the story "Madoff scandal reaches into Canada" appeared in our Jan. 1 edition, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto provided some additional information to The CJN. The federation clarified that one investment manager was responsible for $5.4 million of Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto assets. Of that $5.4 million, $486,000 was invested in a Madoff fund, resulting in a loss of $486,000. The remaining $5 million is not at direct risk from the Madoff scandal.

Did you know pregnancy had a humorous side?

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

Pregnancy can be a laughing matter, says playwright and actor Diane Flacks, who is exposing the lighter side of entering motherhood in her one-woman show, Bear With Me.

The title of the show is apt: mood swings and confusion afflict the newly pregnant woman, Flacks tells Canadian Jewish News on a break from rehearsals.

"The hormones make you crazy," she says. "I once loaded a dishwasher full of cream of wheat, instead of powder. I began to question who I was when I was pregnant."

The 42-year-old Cabbagetown resident, who is the mother of Eli, 6, and Jonathan, 2, began writing a book about pregnancy's dramatic effects several years ago and published the book in 2005 with McClelland & Stewart. The book sparked a live, solo performance that toured Toronto, Ottawa and London, Ont. Evidently, Flacks wasn't the only woman who was looking to laugh as she watched her belly swell.

"Women need to talk about the impact of pregnancy on their lives," she says.

She discovered that other women also managed to find humour when they felt the worst. In fact, one of the oldest expectant women she knew had a smile on her face during pregnancy.

Flacks relates the story of Sarah, Abraham's wife, who laughed when she learned she was going to bear a child. "When you are hit with something uncontrollable like this, sometimes all you can do is laugh," Flacks says.

Bear With Me will highlight some of the more poignant stories from Flacks' pregnancy. Especially relevant to a certain audience is the bit on the "Jewish mother gene," she says.

"This is a serious genetic disorder passed on from a mother to a daughter," she explains. "It turns perfectly laid-back people into anxious mothers. When I had kids, the 'Jewish mother gene' kicked in. I looked at my child and wondered where that rash came from. I was worried if he was too warm, too cold. This all comes from the Jewish school of God-forbid-something-should-happen-to-you way of thinking."

Diane Flacks

Flacks' motherhood story is also spiced with a unique detail: she is queer, and her children were conceived thanks to a male donor. "I'm certainly up front about it in the play," Flacks says.

She relishes staging Bear With Me because it challenged her as a playwright. She has also collaborated on theatre shows with Richard Greenblatt and TV shows such as Kids in the Hall.

"This is a clear way to get my point of view across to an audience," she says.

But is that message somewhat negative, considering all the problems Flacks faced during her pregnancy?

Not at all, she counters. "Once I stopped puking, it really was quite magnificent."

Bear With Me (Nightwood Theatre) runs Jan. 7 to 24 at Berkeley Street Theatre, 26 Berkeley St. For tickets, call 416-368-3110.

Israeli Big Brother sparks cultural controversy

By DINA KRAFT
JTA

TEL AVIV — From Internet chat rooms to household dinner tables, the Israeli version of the reality TV show Big Brother has been given a lot of attention.

With its mansion in the hills of Jerusalem stacked with Israelis representing every token stereotype in the country, the show sparked a 21st-century cultural showdown between Ashkenazi and Sephardi Jews.

The show features contestants who live in seclusion together in a house wired with television cameras that never turn off. Each week, one of them is voted off.

The program, which enjoyed the highest ratings of any TV program in Israel over the last decade, culminated in mid-December with a final episode that had thousands of viewers send text messages with their votes for the winner.

At the focus of the frenzy were a foul-mouthed, middle-aged building contractor named Yossi Boublil and his sidekick and daughter, Einav. Of Moroccan background, they were the two Sephardi stars of the show. The father, who finished second in the contest, has come to symbolize the anti-hero, stereotypical Sephardi: an aggressive, macho man of the people. Even his own revelation that he once tried to aggressively lure a girlfriend into group sex did nothing to dampen his popularity.

There has been much hand-wringing in Israel over the "Boublilification" of Israeli society. Critics complained the show was dragging the nation's culture into the sewer and distracting the country from real issues of importance.

One sombre poster on Tel Aviv notice boards admonished Israelis to think a little more about Gilad Shalit, the captive Israeli soldier thought to be in the Gaza Strip, and a little less about Boublil. "That's the real reality," the poster said.

Israeli television, which until 1993 consisted of just one state-run channel, once focused on more serious-minded programming, heavy on social documentary programs and BBC dramas. Now, with cable and two other regular broadcast channels, Israel increasingly has the same kind of entertainment clutter that can be found elsewhere around the world.

The debate over Big Brother highlighted the conflict between the old Israeli cultural guard and the new.

Longtime Israeli broadcaster Haim Yavin, considered the Walter Cronkite of Israeli news, was appalled that his documentary series on Israeli Arabs was not promoted on Channel Two, the same station that aired Big Brother.

The success of the show has been attributed to producers' ability to cleverly handpick contestants who represented a microcosm of Israel.

Among them was Boublil's main rival, Shifra Cornfeld, the artsy daughter of a rabbi who abandoned her haredi upbringing to become secular. To many, Cornfeld – who emerged as the victor on the show and won its $250,000 prize – represented the stereotype of the Ashkenazi elite, living in Tel Aviv in a bubble of left-wing politics and liberalism, detached from the rest of Israel.

Other contestants included a religiously observant man, a gay man who came from a Russian immigrant background and an attractive Arab-Israeli aspiring actress.

Jewish author inspired by family

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

Ricki Segal's first book, My Zayde and Other Memories of Growing Up Jewish, grew out of a short story that she began writing in 1995.

She wrote The Doll (page 96 in the 102-page book) as a tribute to her grandmother, Gertie Lazar, who was already suffering from Alzheimer's disease.

The short story is a semi-fictionalized account of her baba's life as told in short vignettes.

Segal was inspired to write the story after someone she knew compared visiting an individual afflicted by Alzheimer's disease to visiting a cabbage in a supermarket.

Ricki Segal

"People who have Alzheimer's still have souls," she says, noting that many of her older family members, including her mother, Hilda Stern, have or have had the disease.

She said that $2 from every copy sold of My Zayde and Other Memories will be donated to the Alzheimer Society of Canada.

The first-born child of Sid and Hilda Stern, Segal grew up in Winnipeg's largely Jewish north end and attended Peretz School and local high schools. Her first career was as an X-ray technician.

After marrying in 1967, she and her husband moved to Regina. During her 28 years there she raised three children and participated in the Jewish community.

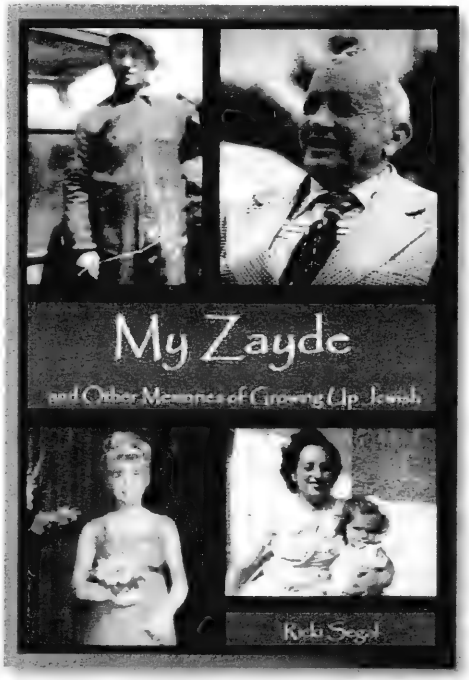
"There were quite a number of young Jewish families in Regina at that time with children the same age as ours," she said. "I was on the synagogue board and served as social chair for many years. I was also a member of Hadassah."

After her children started school, Segal worked in sales for a time and later at the Regina Public Library.

She and her first husband separated in 1995, and she moved to Toronto, where one of her sons was living. Although she has been writing poetry and short stories all her life, she became involved in journalism professionally only after relocating to Toronto.

"I was a freelance writer and did a lot of work for a public relations firm," she said. She also did some freelance work for the Jewish Post and News and The CJN.

She moved back to Regina in 2001 where she met and married her current husband, Harold Segal. The couple moved to Winnipeg last June to be nearer to her mother, who is a resident of the Simkin Centre, a personal care home.



"I finished the book on June 26, and we left for Winnipeg on June 27," she said.

My Zayde and Other Memories is a compilation of Segal's poems and short stories about different family members and events in her life growing up in Winnipeg. There are also several pages of pictures of the extended Stern, Lazar, Daiter and Schnoor family members.

"I felt that I had to write this book and these stories because I am the oldest of the Lazar grandchildren. I felt that I had to tell the tales."

Segal launched her book at the end of October at McNally Robinson Booksellers in Winnipeg. She also gave a reading at the Simkin Centre.

Eye on Arts

PLAY EXAMINES INTIMATE MOMENTS OF ORTHODOX COUPLE'S ARRANGED WEDDING

After its successful première in 2008, Julie Tepperman has expanded her play, Yichud/Seclusion, that examines intimate moments surrounding the arranged wedding of a young Orthodox couple, Rachel Blitzer and Chaim Berman, and its effect on their families.

Described as a one-act play in three parts, Yichud/Seclusion is presented by Convergence Theatre, whose two artistic directors, Tepperman and Aaron Willis, play the young newlyweds: they are actually married in real life. The cast also includes Daniel Karasik, Linda Kash, Adam Lazarus, Neil Naft, Michael Rubenfeld and a klezmer band. As at a real Orthodox wedding, men and women in the audience are seated separately.

Presented in conjunction with the Fringe of Toronto and the Next Stage Theatre Festival, the play runs Jan. 7 to 18 at Factory Studio Theatre, 125 Bathurst St. at Adelaide. $15, $12. 416-966-1062, www.fringetoronto.com

Also part of the Next Stage Festival is Don't Look, an "incest comedy-drama" written and performed by Daniel Sadavoy and Rebecca Applebaum, directed by Maya Rabinovitch. Utilizing parallel narratives twisted together like a double helix, the play follows a pair of star-crossed cousins whose innocent "makeout session" at a shivah leads to shame, regret and "unnerving hilarity." Presented by the Steady State Theatre Project at the Factory Studio Theatre, 125 Bathurst St. Jan. 7 to 18. $15, $12.

New & Noteworthy: McMaster University professor Alan Mendelson has written Exiles from Nowhere: The Jews and the Canadian Elite, an exploration of a strain of genteel yet persistent anti-Semitism that has flourished in the hardy soil of the true North strong and free.

Mendelson traces an intellectual heritage from Goldwin Smith, the notoriously prejudiced 19th-century "sage of the Grange," through a host of intellectuals and political figures, including Henri Bourassa, Mackenzie King and Vincent Massey. The path leads to Massey's nephew, George Grant, the "Christian triumphalist" philosopher whose 1965 book Lament for A Nation, assured his prominence as a public intellectual. Grant, like Goldwin Smith, professed that Jews were a discredited people condemned to eternal exile and could not be loyal citizens of Canada or any nation.

The book is an important and thoughtful addition to our understanding of homegrown anti-Semitism that, far from being marginal, was tolerated at the very centre of our intellectual and political life. It was published by Robin Brass Studio.

Video buff urges us to preserve our memories

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Sam Hoffer, a retired management consultant in Thornhill, strongly suggests that we take time to record our remembrances – of our own lives, of the lives of those we love, or of the history of an organization that we hold dear.

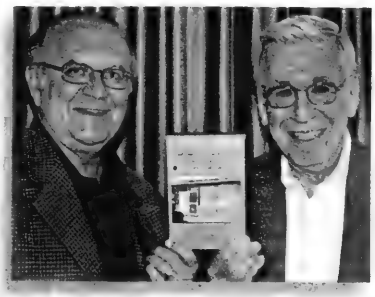
"Many of us regret that we did not listen and did not document the thoughts and events in the lives of those who have now passed on, and we can no longer share the precious stories that they carried with them because we did not capture them on paper, on a voice recording or on film," Hoffer says.

Hoffer was born in Czernowitz, Romania, after World War II. His parents and two brothers were Holocaust survivors. The family came to Canada in 1951 when Hoffer was six years old, and settled on a farm in a Jewish settlement in Saskatchewan. Hoffer's father died when he was 13 and the family moved to Winnipeg, where he later studied economics at the University of Winnipeg.

He moved to Ottawa and worked for the federal government as an economist, and in 1970, he moved to Toronto, where he met and married Ronnie Rutman.

Hoffer was always interested in filming and would document events for family and friends.

His brothers, Leizer and Yossel Hoffer, were teenagers when they and their parents were incarcerated in the Transnistria concentration camp. For more than half a century, they recounted only fragments of their stories.



Sam Hoffer (left) and Harvey Golombek hold the cover of the DVD they co-produced for the Drildzer Congregation and Society.

Then Hoffer videotaped a two-hour, free-flowing conversation, in which his brothers spoke of their lives before the war, the rise of anti-Semitism, their experiences at the concentration camp, their survival and their eventual freedom. The tape was enhanced by archival photographs recorded by Sam.

"Their reflective discourse on this two-volume video titled Reflections is peppered by spontaneous dialogue from their unique perspectives," he says. "It makes a very interesting historical record for their families."

Hoffer got involved in another project when Toronto's Drildzer Congregation and Society decided to prepare a commemorative video about the life and times of the group.

Working with Harvey Golombek, a psychiatry professor at the University of Toronto and a Drildzer member, Hoffer co-produced the video, which presents a vivid portrayal of the evolution and growth of the society from the 1920s to the present.

Golombek says the Drildzer project was inspired by the organization's desire to capture and preserve the memories of those in the society who were central to its development.

"Sadly," he notes, "some of the people we featured in the video have since passed away. Many of the families were delighted with the video because we all had family and roots through the Drildzer."

At the 50th anniversary celebration of the Suburban Study branch of the National Council of Jewish Women, Toronto section, a special program was presented looking back half a century. The presentation and the group's archival slides were videotaped by Hoffer.

The members of Suburban Study were delighted to be able to obtain copies of that video.

"There are many ways to preserve memories, and I am very gratified to be able to play a part in helping this happen," Hoffer says.

He adds that people are reluctant to tell their story, but once they do it, "they want to see it over and over – they are fascinated.

"I don't care how they do it, but people should do it, because the moment passes and it's irretrievable."

He is happy to encourage people to record their memories, he says.

"Today, it's easy to capture and preserve our memories and experiences. Many people don't think they have the ability to speak. My advice is: do it, you may not get another chance."

Produced by the Israeli production house Keshet, the show came down to a battle between the Boublils and their three Ashkenazi rivals. Einav Boublil nicknamed Ashkenazim in general as "the Friedmans" – a new colloquial term that quickly caught on nationwide.

Omri Marcus, a developer of reality TV content for the Israeli production house Reshet, says reality TV is a venue for more honest depictions of who people really are.

"In Big Brother, the show developed a new take on the culture war – not the type we have been seeing here since the 1950s and 1960s, but a different type of clash," Marcus said.

He described the Boublil duo as the Israeli version of rednecks, and suggests Ashkenazim and Sephardim are divided more along socio-economic lines than along ethnic ones. "It's the strong versus the weak sectors of society," he said.

In the show, Boublil says whatever comes to mind, completely unfiltered.

"Here comes this Archie Bunker-like figure who is crude and homophobic, and we love him because he shocks us with his stupidity," Marcus said. "But as time passes, the joke is on us because the person becomes bigger than the program itself."

Joshua Sobol, a leading Israeli playwright, said the Big Brother phenomenon is part of the larger phenomenon of the increasing popularity of reality TV in Israel.

"It injects into the culture a habit of viewers staring mindlessly without thinking, and people get addicted to entertainment without imagination, thinking or feeling," Sobol told JTA. "It's making people into a nation of sheep."

Sobol is among a group of artists who staged a demonstration against reality television in Israel to coincide with the show's finale last month.

"When the messages are violent, shallow and coarse, the lowest common denominator is what sells," read flyers advertising the event. "We demand a different kind of culture!"

Among those who were hooked on the show is Moran Haim, a 25-year-old manicurist from Holon, a Tel Aviv suburb. She said the show's focus on Ashkenazi-Sephardi tensions reflect the real Israel.

"It's the main issue in this country, not Palestinians versus Israelis," she said. "Again and again, it comes back to the pain that comes from being from the country's periphery and the contrasting experience of someone like Shifra, who may not have been born with a silver spoon in her mouth, but represents a more educated and professional type of person."

For Haim, whose father is of Yemenite origin and whose mother comes from a Polish family, the show also felt very familiar.

"My father is a Boublil and my mother is a Friedman," she said. "I'm the balance in the middle."

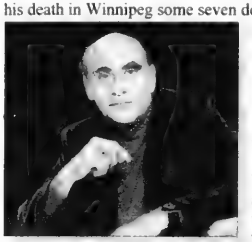
Newman writes balanced bio of media tycoon Izzy Asper

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The newest biography of Israel Harold Asper, Izzy: The Passionate Life and Turbulent Times of Izzy Asper, Canada's Media Mogul (HarperCollins), takes us on a journey from his birth in small-town Manitoba in 1932 to his death in Winnipeg some seven decades later.



Peter C. Newman

It's an interesting ride, and the experienced driver at the wheel, Peter Newman, has been writing about Canadian business and politics for years now.

This usually lively book is a profile of an ambitious Jewish boy who had a career as a tax lawyer, provincial politician, merchant banker and communications tycoon.

When he died, leaving his business in the hands of his children, his $4-billion Canwest empire was a monolith, consisting of television stations that reached 94 per cent of Canada's TV-viewing public and a nationwide newspaper chain spearheaded by the Toronto-based National Post.

And lest it be forgotten, Asper was a passionate supporter of Israel, a right-wing Zionist who interpreted every anti-Israel remark or speech as a personal insult.

Newman is at his best when he concentrates on the man rather than his steady climb to affluence and influence. Most readers may be bored by the details of his acquisitions, but they will be stopped in their tracks when they read about Asper the person.

Although Newman received a research grant from the Asper Foundation to write the book, he does not engage in hagiography. Izzy is definitely not a vanity project designed to pander to his heirs. As Newman puts it, "I would have complete independence on the writing of the book as well as responsibility for its contents, which meant that the Aspers could sue me if they were so inclined."

The Aspers need not worry. Izzy is a balanced work and is felicitously written.

Asper was a contradictory figure, "a polarizing presence" worshipped by friends and followers and feared and loathed by critics and disillusioned journalists. "He was born to make trouble, and he did," Newman tartly observes.

An individual who refused to distinguish between the possible and the impossible, Asper was a quintessential entrepreneur who was at once charismatic and combative.

Loyal to allies, he was toxic to enemies. "He took everything personally, even weather reports, and defended his turf with the single-mindedness of a cornered Bengal tiger," writes Newman in a typically rhetorical flourish.

Asper's relations with senior employees could be unpleasant, Newman suggests. He tried to bend editors and publishers to "his very special view of the world by issuing bureaucratic edicts, canned editorials and pink slips."

Yet, as Newman points out, Asper was a mensch in private, a philanthropist whose generosity had few equals in Canada.

Asper, whose original family name was Ausereper before it was anglicized, was born in Minnedosa. His parents, classically trained musicians from the Ukrainian town of Odessa, arrived in Canada separately.

Although Asper was a success story par excellence, the first job he ever held, that of a sweeper in his father's movie theatre, could hardly have foretold his future.

After earning a law degree and building his practice into the largest Jewish law firm in western Canada, he began writing a nationally syndicated newspaper column on taxes, which led to his only published book, The Benson Iceberg: A Critical Analysis of the White Paper on Tax Reform.

Asper's political career, as leader of Manitoba's Liberal party, was short-lived and undistinguished. It was characterized by his espousal of the elimination of the welfare state and his self-appointed role as the champion of the West against the entrenched interests of the East.

Newman devotes chapter and verse to Asper's rise as proprietor of Canada's most formidable media empire.

In delineating his remarkable ascent, Newman lists a number of "Asper Axioms" to which he adhered as he climbed to the top of the greasy pole. Among them were: "In negotiating, never give anything without getting something in return. Whatever can happen, will happen, and plan a disaster scenario."

Newman's forays into his business smarts are revealing, but the majority of readers will probably doze off reading about them.

They may, however, perk up once they reach the part about anti-Semitism in Canada's communications industry and Asper's attempts to deal with it.

Being Jewish to his core, Asper identified intimately with Israel. The connection was solidified by a visit to Yad Vashem, the Holocaust memorial and museum complex in Jerusalem. It was there that he became "acutely aware" of why Israeli Jews are so attached to their "postage stamp of a country."

As Newman suggests, Asper took it upon himself to become one of Israel's most ardent defenders, though many Jewish Canadians were appalled by his harsh right-wing views.

Asper, who eventually drifted away from the federal Liberal party and donated funds to the now-defunct Reform party, denounced Liberal leaders for their "weak-kneed policies" on Israel.

He was exasperated by the fact that the prime minister, Jean Chrétien, could not distinguish between Palestinian terrorist attacks and Israel's "measured" responses. Further, he claimed that Canada's department of foreign affairs was "riddled with Arabists," and that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, particularly one of its former correspondents in Israel, Neil Macdonald, was guilty of biased reporting.

In rounding off his book, Newman pays tribute to Asper's wife, Ruth Miriam (Babs), his anchor, and notes that his bad habits probably contributed to the heart attack that killed him.

He liked to drink. He chain-smoked, even while sipping soup. He was too fond of cholesterol-laden cheeseburgers. And, of course, he always seemed to be under tremendous stress.

In this respect, Newman quotes his wife: "Izzy was very impatient in the latter years… It was almost as if he had a sense of doom, that he had to get it all done, fast, fast, fast. He wasn't relaxing. He didn't take into account his physical condition in any way…"

Asper paid the ultimate price for the neglect of his health, but he left behind a rich legacy of accomplishment, as Newman relates at length.

Up again, down again Micflikier up with Amerks

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

Jacob Micflikier was in no hurry to check out of the Rochester hotel he lived in for over a month, but wouldn't have minded finding someplace else to settle for the duration of the American Hockey League (AHL) season.

After being recalled from the Florida Everblades of the East Coast Hockey League (ECHL) on Oct. 23, Micflikier appeared in all 13 of the Americans' games, recording one goal and five assists, but was still unsure what his future holds with the club.

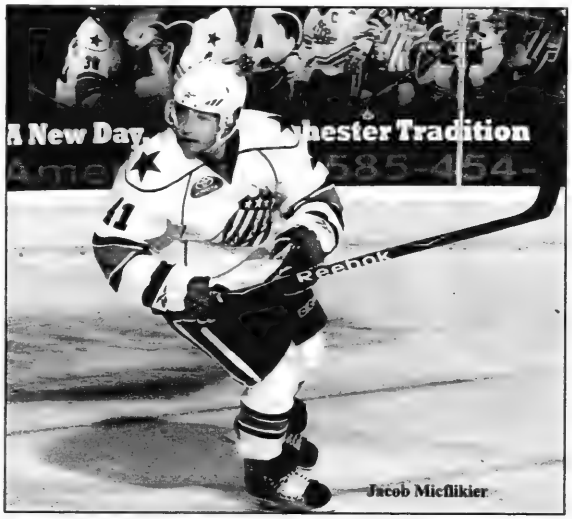
On Nov. 22 he got the bad news: he was being sent back down to Estero, Fl., between Ft. Myers and Naples, where the Everblades play. But it didn't mean the end of his AHL dreams.

In eight games with the 'Blades he registered nine goals and added 12 assists – near the top in team scoring – enough to warrant a second call up two weeks after the demotion. In 12 subsequent games with the Amerks, he scored one goal and three assists. All told, in 25 AHL games, Micflikier had two goals and eight assists on a team that is averaging only two goals a game. The Amerks, last in the North Division, play their first two games of 2009 in the MTS Centre in Winnipeg, Micflikier's hometown.

"Each game kind of feels like a tryout for me," he said in Rochester prior to being sent to Florida. "I've played well enough to solidify a spot, but at the same time, nothing is certain in this league, and on this team. I'm still trying to earn my spot every game. It's all a matter of me going out there and doing my job."

After having a solid training camp and playing in all three of Rochester's preseason games, the 5-foot-8, 180-pound left winger was reassigned to Florida prior to opening night. He was brought back up to spark the offence after the team lost its first five games, scoring seven goals in the process.

Rochester was victorious in the 24-year-old's season debut, defeating Quad City 5-4 on Oct. 24, but lost the next two nights, 6-1 and 8-3 and has been struggling ever since. The Americans sat last in the league's North Division at 9-22-0-3 through Dec. 30, having scored just 66 goals on the year.



Jacob Micflikier

Micflikier knows that he is one of the guys being counted on to contribute offensively and is eager to start putting the puck in the net, being just one step away from the National Hockey League. He signed with Rochester over the summer after missing a large part of last season with a broken leg and ruptured ligaments in his ankle.

He had a goal and four assists in eight games last year with Springfield after a call up from the Stockton Thunder of the ECHL. Prior to the season, he attended the Edmonton Oilers camp.

Micflikier was one of the rookies selected to participate in last year's ECHL All-Star game, but could not take part due to the severe injury he suffered in a practice after his skate caught a rut. He had scored 10 goals and added 23 assists in 27 games prior to the mishap.

Micflikier made his professional debut in 2006, tallying three goals and an assist in nine games with Springfield following a four-year collegiate career at the University of New Hampshire, where he graduated with a degree in political science and a business minor.

"Being from western Canada, it crossed my mind to play major junior, and I did go to Brandon's camp one year," he said. "With my size, I didn't know what kind of future hockey would bring me. The safest route was to take the college route, get my education first, and work with hockey after that.

"It's a decision I'm happy with, I never looked back or regretted it."

While Micflikier did have a bar mitzvah, he didn't attend Hebrew school, as his brother and sister did, leaving home for the ninth grade. At 14, he enrolled in the hockey program at Shattuck-St. Mary's School in Farabault, Minn. After that, he played junior hockey for a couple of years in South Dakota with the Sioux Falls Stampede of the U.S. Hockey League before going on to college.

Peer and Levy claim titles on intense final day

By NIR WOLF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

RA'ANANA, Israel — After two days of rain delays, Israel's top players gathered to play their semifinals and finals of the Israeli tennis championships in succession. Shahar Peer and Harel Levy emerged as the women's and men's singles champions.

The day started with Tzipi Obziler quickly disposing of Chen Astrugo 6-1, 6-2, and Levy obliterating Amir Weintraub 6-2, 6-4. Peer had more difficulty with Julia Glushko, the world's number 356, who managed to win the first set over Peer in her career. Glushko continued to fight, fending off numerous game points throughout the match before succumbing 6-3, 4-6, 6-3.

Peer, who changed her style after a disastrous year in which she dropped out of the world's top 20 players, played more defensively than usual. She never played by the net and her serve was not noticeably more effective, yet she prevailed nonetheless.

Like Peer, Dudi Sela showed signs of struggling despite holding a substantial lead over Noam Okun before finally winning 6-4, 6-4.

Peer took the first set of the women's final, which started after a 90-minute delay, with a solid 6-4 showing, but then fell apart in the second set. Obziler easily took the set 6-1, and the 600 spectators filling the stands split into Obziler and Peer supporters. Obziler broke Peer's serve early in the third set to take a 4-1 lead, but then made some critical errors that allowed the world's number 38 back into the match. Peer won 7-2 in the tiebreaker to capture her third straight title.

In the men's final, Sela tried to make a shot between his legs at set point in the opening set and lost to Levy 6-4. However, the world's number 112 regained his composure to win the second set 6-3. Sela broke Levy's serve to take a 4-3 lead, but Levy broke in return. Tied 5-5, Levy survived deuce seven times before gaining advantage on his serve and then winning the game. A few minutes later, he broke Sela again to win 7-5.

In the doubles competition Andy Ram and Noam Bar won the men's final, while Julia Glushko and Nadine Fahoun won the women's title.

Ex NFLer finds spiritual fulfilment in Judaism

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

The turning point in Alan Veingrad's life came in 2003, a decade after he retired as an offensive lineman with the Super Bowl champion Dallas Cowboys.

That year he reflected upon a newspaper story which talked about his life 10 years after leaving the National Football League. While raising his family, Veingrad was also spending a lot of time fishing, scuba diving and practicing martial arts.

He felt after reading the article that his life needed more meaning and purpose, so he went about making some changes.

The family started to go to shul on Shabbat and spent a lot of Friday evenings at a number of rabbis' homes. He realized that by becoming observant, he could easily incorporate the feeling from Friday night into other days of the week.

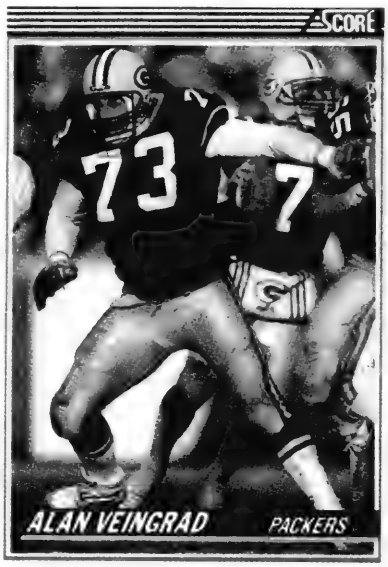
Raised in a typical Jewish household in Brooklyn, N.Y., the New Yorker's family celebrated various holidays with a focus on the meals. He said he had his first authentic Shabbat dinner a year after retirement and attended a Torah class a week later as final payment on a medical debt to a Miami radiologist cousin.

He asked the rabbi for reading material after the class and continued attending for the next six or seven years, interested in the weekly inspiration and messages found in the parshah, more than anything else.

"It inspired me to continue learning and growing as a person," he said.

"After both those experiences, I realized there was more going on in life than football, golf, and fishing," he said in a recent telephone interview. Veingrad spoke to The CJN while en route to Las Angeles, where he had three scheduled speaking engagements with Jewish day schools as well as Young Israel of Century City. Affiliated with the Chabad-Lubavitch movement, he has spoken in the last few years at more than 100 Chabad institutions, yeshivot, and Jewish day schools.

Veingrad, who now goes by his Hebrew name, Shlomo, began wearing a yarmulke and tzitzit for the first time in 2004 on a plane ride to Israel, and has kept them on as part of his daily attire ever since. Due to family, work, and speaking engagements, he has not been able to make a return trip.



The 45-year-old began his speaking career while playing with the Green Bay Packers, who signed Veingrad as a free agent after he went undrafted as an All-American out of East Texas State, now known as Texas A&M.

Super Bowl winner Alan Veingrad, as he was in his playing days with the Green Bay Packers and the Dallas Cowboys, and today, above.

At the time, his brother was a DARE [Drug Abuse Resistance Educator] Officer with the Metro-Dade Police Department and in the off-season asked him to come to schools and speak at their graduation. The theme was usually centred around saying "no to drugs."

After 86 games, spanning five years with the Packers and a couple in Dallas with the Cowboys, the 6-foot-5, 270-pound lineman retired from the game and felt he had a story to tell.

Residing in Fort Lauderdale, where he sells commercial real estate, Veingrad recalled speaking to a group of both Jews and non-Jews in 1994.

"I wasn't really doing much with my own personal spiritual growth at the time and it wasn't until I started to be a Shomer Shabbos, keep all the observances, that my speaking career started to take off," he said.

For the past five years, Veingrad has been in demand across North America.

"I have a number of different messages depending on the speech I'm giving," said Veingrad, who spoke three times in Toronto over a weekend in the fall, and has been to Canada on five separate occasions over the past couple of years. "The bulk of my message is always around people that are really just like I am, grew up very secular, have an interest in Judaism, however, they are maybe apprehensive or haven't really grown that aspect of their life or their relationship with G-d.

"I just want to encourage people that I lived one lifestyle and now I'm living a completely different lifestyle. Everyone should open themselves up and embrace Judaism and grow with Judaism at their own pace."

In speaking about his journey, Veingrad also likes to talk about incorporating exercise into one's life and eating right, one of the challenges he says the observant world faces.

"It's been neglected," he said. "It's a real problem. One can serve G-d better with better health and a better diet."

Some friendships work better

Can guys and girls just be friends? Yes.

Can guys and girls who once dated just be friends? Sure, but why would you want to be?

I know that the philosophy behind every great, working relationship is that the couple are friends as well as each other's loves, and so to some, it only makes sense to keep that friendship going once the love has passed.

But like most things that seem logical on paper, reality always seems to paint a different picture.

Before I go on, I should say that if there are kids involved, by all means, it's more important than ever to stay friends – and good friends at that. But if there are no strings attaching the couple to each other, I say it's best to cut loose and run.

I've tried being friends with exes, I really have, and well, today I'm not good friends with any of them. Not to say I don't feel friendly towards them. On the contrary, I wish them the best. But I'm always well aware of the boundaries that exes should impose on each other – boundaries that make any real sort of friendship a real challenge.

Does my ex want to hear about the new hot boy in my life? Of course not, but he'll pretend to be happy for me until our next conversation, when he makes sure to get me back 10 times over by nonchalantly slipping in the name of his hot new conquest and some hot new details.

When you're in a bad relationship, you get used to the tit-for-tat. But tit-for-tat often becomes a not-so-friendly competition of upmanship when you're attempting a friendly relationship with an ex.

Chances are if you're my ex, it's because I hated the drama to begin with and I'm in no rush to revisit or remember any of it.

I don't care how mature you and your ex are. I've seen this play out to different extremes with the most respectful of couples. The only difference between them and the couples who love drama are that they each pretended not to notice and care about each other's digs.

But everyone notices and everyone does care.

Now don't get me wrong. A guy friend is the best kind of friend a girl could have. They're objective, they know how to decode guy-speak, and they're the first to tell you when you're acting like a girl.

Thankfully, I have a number of good guy friends who have helped guide me along the most trying of relationships.

But the reason these friendships work is because they are based on nothing more than a platonic affection for each other. That means when we go to the mall and I catch him checking out a hot blonde, I'll point out the even hotter blonde to his right.

It also means we'll always be honest with each other, take special pains not to hurt each other and leave the games to our ridiculous crushes. Sounds like a relationship? It is. It's a special kind of relationship called a "friendship." This type of friendship plus love is undoubtedly the best kind of relationship there is.

When a guy and a girl like each other, both have too much at stake to be true friends. When emotions are involved, people naturally put up some guards to make sure that they are not being taken advantage of.

And when true emotions are involved, it's too hard to switch things off and pretend it never really mattered.

SWEET POTATO SOUP WITH BUTTERED PECANS

- 3/4 c finely chopped onion
- 1 c finely chopped leek
- 2 lg garlic cloves, minced
- 3 lg carrots, sliced thin
- 1 bay leaf
- 3 tblsp.parve margarine
- 3 lg sweet potatoes, peeled, halved, slice thin
- 1 baking potato, sliced thin
- 5 c parve chicken or vegetable broth
- 3/4 c dry white wine
- 1 1/2 c water

In large pot, cook margarine, onion, leek, garlic, carrots and bay leaf until softened; add salt and pepper to taste. Add potatoes, sliced thin, broth, wine, and water. Simmer covered for 15-20 min.; discard bay leaf. Puree mixture in batches in food processor until very smooth, transferring as it's pureed to a large saucepan; add additional broth to thin soup if necessary.

Pecans

3/4 c chopped pecans
2 tbls parve margarine

In a skillet cook pecans in margarine with salt to taste over moderate heat, stirring occasionally, for 10 min., or until golden brown. Transfer them to paper towels to drain. Add to soup when serving. Can be made a couple days in advance and kept in an airtight container.

About Life

Dear Ella,

My youngest daughter is now three, and I am the size of a house. I had three kids and gained steadily with each pregnancy. I am very unhappy with myself and, at this size, I find it difficult be the good mother that I want to be.

I decided that 2009 is the year I am going to get my life back. I need this resolution to be different from the others. I am one of those "Monday" dieters, starting a new diet every Monday. I have been reading about different programs – low carb, low fat, counting points, portion control delivery, just too many to choose from.

My husband is supportive of this change as well. He has hinted to me that I am out of control and need to get a handle on this. I have gained close to 100 pounds since my wedding day 14 years ago. Any advice you can give to help me be successful this time?

This Time for Sure

Dear This Time for Sure,

New Year's resolutions serve only as a start date to change something in your life. The actual "day" you start is much less important than the specific plan you have for success.

Making the decision to change is your first step. If you want to be successful, you need a well-formulated plan. Being a regular dieter, you know by now that "diets" don't work. They all work temporarily because you suddenly become aware of what you are eating, and the side effect is that you automatically eat less. Losing weight is a formula: "garbage in, garbage out" – the number of calories you consume versus the number of calories you expend.

Experts will tell you that the best way to lose weight is to change your lifestyle. If possible, try to find a nutritionist to work with. They are trained to teach you healthy, balanced eating and portion control. They work with your strengths and limitations. The other side of the coin is exercise. Remember you need to expend energy (calories) in order to have a weight loss. There is so much more than just the food – hence our billion-dollar diet industry.

Don't worry so much about making this a "resolution." Devise a plan that will work for you first, then start. If you really want this, 2009 will be your year to be a healthy, strong woman. Good luck and happy new year.

Readers may submit their questions to Ella at The CJN., *email: eb@cjnews.com. But Ella is not a professional counsellor. Look what they did for me

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

A friend recently told me how he felt about his parents getting older.

"My perception of my parents is different now. I see them as older. I can see they've slowed down and things are different than they were before. They are a little bit less able."

He said his parents are still the central figures in his life, his sisters' lives and the children's lives, and they give everyone a solid foundation.

"I always count on my mom and dad. Anything I need, they are there. Any time I need to find some peace from life, I go there.

"When I would have a bad day at work and feel so out of it, I would hang out with my parents. A lot of times, I wouldn't say what was going on. It was enough just to be there with them.

"That has not changed."

My buddy, in his mid-40s, was very contemplative throughout this interview, recognizing the continuum of life and that people get old, but his parents' youthful attitude makes this transition time easier.

"My dad just turned 81 and my mother is 78, and they feel older. But they don't have a negative outlook on life, or give that sense of 'we're getting old and this is depressing.' Things are slowly starting to hurt though – their hearing has gone a bit, and they are more cautious about their driving. You see bits and pieces creep in – natural aging stuff, but they are very vibrant, go regularly to the gym, and are actively involved with their grandchildren's lives."

My buddy's children are young teenagers, and on some level, they are aware their bubbie and zaidy are aging, but express the feeling that they will always be around. His sisters are aware the aging process has come to visit their parents. They never really talk about it, but it's understood they will all take care of their mom and dad when the time comes.

"Look what they have done for us," he says. "I hope my kids do the same for me one day. That's the way it's supposed to be."

Time marches on, my friend tells me, and as it does, he thinks about the next phase of his existence.

"I know my parents are going to pass away, but I try not to think about it too often because I don't want to face it until I have to. I like having them here. It's so comforting. My parents symbolize home, and once they are not here, I'll feel lost."

To everyone else, he says, he is a grown-up man, but as long as he has parents, inside he feels like a kid and has a licence to act like one when he's around them.

"When I'm with them, I love to act goofy. I always have. I always will."

He concludes the interview sounding sad. "Soon it will be my time to do the tough work, to be their parents. It's difficult to see my parents as being older, because I always thought they would be around forever. They were my default when I was a kid – and even today. How nice it is to say, 'Ah, I'm going to my mom's house.'"

He looks down at nothing in particular and says, "My dad showed me the tallit he wants to be buried in. I sloughed it off. I didn't want to see it."

Morality plays role in IAF missions: pilot

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Flying over the Gaza Strip, former Israeli Air Force (IAF) pilot Lt.-Col. S. saw first hand the tactics Hamas employs when shelling Israel.

Twice he saw Hamas operatives firing into Israel from houses inside a Palestinian town. "They don't go to the woods or open places. They use houses and shoot from open windows into Israel," he said in an interview with The CJN.

S., who retired from active service after 23 years, knows most of the IAF's commanders – former and current – who make the final call on whether to drop a bomb on a terrorist target.

The decision, he said, is not taken lightly and every effort is made to keep civilian losses to a minimum.

The air force expends great energy to make sure only legitimate targets are hit, and he rejects suggestions from Israel's critics that Palestinians are being massacred in Gaza. In fact, the ratio of civilians to terrorists who are hit has been going down for years. "It's a major focus of the IAF. I think it has to do with a wider issue and that's morality," he said.

Jewish groups review security

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Hundreds of Jewish organizations in North America have been advised to reassess their security procedures in light of the situation in the Middle East.

The Secure Community Network (SCN), which co-ordinates security for North American Jewish institutions, held a conference call Jan. 6 with representatives of more than 500 Jewish organizations, including synagogues, and similar calls later in the day with representatives of Jewish community centres and the following day with local federation executives.

Doron Horowitz, community security director for UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and one of the conference call speakers, along with representatives of the U.S. Department of Homeland Security, outlined a "top 10 list" of security precautions, and detailed concerns that should be addressed, in order of priority.

He declined to be more specific about his recommendations in order not to compromise security, but he said "it's about being vigilant and taking preventive measures, and being aware."

The federation has a close relationship with law enforcement authorities, he added.

Horowitz – who works with Canadian Jewish Congress and UJA Federation and affiliates – noted that, while "rhetoric has increased," there are "no specific threats in terms of an inevitable or imminent attack."

However, he added, in light of the situation in the Middle East and "strong anti-Israel sentiments," the Jewish community and its institutions are in a "heightened state of alert," given recent incidents in Europe and also that emotions regarding the situation run high.

Any responses from the Jewish community should be "driven by reason and logic, not by emotion or fear," Horowitz said.

The News in Brief

Canada

Protesters Arrested

TORONTO — Eight Jewish women, including prominent activist Judy Rebick, were arrested Jan. 7 after they entered the Israeli consulate in Toronto and began protesting Israel's actions in Gaza. The women entered the heavily secured consulate in pairs. Once they were all inside, they staged a sit-in. The RCMP was called and led the women out in handcuffs. They were turned over to Toronto police, and each was charged with one count of breach of the peace. The charges were later dropped and the women were released. Israeli peace activists, artists, and several students were in the group. In a statement, they said that they were "outraged at Israel's latest assault on the Palestinian people and by the Canadian government's refusal to condemn these massacres." A spokesperson for the consulate declined comment when contacted by The CJN.

World

Djerba Trial Opens

PARIS — Two suspects accused of helping to bomb an 1,900-year-old Tunisian synagogue said they were innocent on the first day of their trial in Paris. A third suspect, Khalid Sheik Mohammed, who is also an accused planner of the 9/11 terror attacks and an adviser to Al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden, wasn't present at the Jan. 5 trial. He's being held at the U.S. prison camp in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. The shul attack took place on the island of Djerba in April 2002. It killed 21 people and wounded 30 others.

Woman Nominated

WASHINGTON — U.S. president-elect Barack Obama has nominated a Jewish woman to serve as solicitor general. Elena Kagan, dean of Harvard Law School, would be the first female to serve in the job if confirmed by the Senate.

Recount Challenged

MINNEAPOLIS — Norm Coleman said he'll challenge Al Franken's U.S. Senate victory in court. The Minnesota senator, a Republican, said Jan. 7 that he'll contest the recount, which ended with Franken winning by 225 votes. Coleman, who served one Senate term, brushed aside calls to drop his challenge. Minnesota law prevents the certification of an election until all legal challenges are settled, which means the seat could be vacant for weeks. The race between Franken, a former Saturday Night Live performer, and Coleman was the only 2008 Senate campaign with two Jewish candidates.

Congress raps MNA over anti-Gaza rally

MONTREAL — Canadian Jewish Congress says Amir Khadir isn't fit to sit in the Quebec National Assembly unless he denounces "repeated" calls to kill Jews and other "heinous" slogans heard at a large Jan. 4 protest in downtown Montreal against Israel's Gaza invasion.

Calls of the Arabic "al-mawt al-Yahud" were heard, as well as the chant "Khaybar, khaybar, ya Yahoud, jaysh Muhammad sawfa yaud," which, the Quebec-Israel Committee says is a call for the return of the armies of Muhammad, which harks back to a seventh-century Muslim massacre of Jews at Medina.

Khadir was the most prominent speaker at the protest. A longtime pro-Palestinian activist and co-leader of Québec Solidaire, he was elected in the Dec. 7 election in the Plateau Mont-Royal riding, the first member of the left-wing sovereigntist party to sit in the legislature.

"His failure to denounce the hate messages and calls for the murder of Jews raises grave concerns about his ability to represent his constituents in Mercier in a dignified and unbiased manner," said CJC Quebec region president Victor Goldbloom.

CJC said his lack of response to its demand he dissociate himself from the "hate messages" raises "serious doubt about his commitment to the values of freedom, dignity and social justices he purports to defend."

The rally also saw the burning of an Israeli flag outside the Israeli consulate, shouts of "intifadah," the flying of the Hamas and Hezbollah flags, and accusations of Israeli "terrorism" and "massacre."

Funding Considered

NEW YORK — The Orthodox Union is considering an emergency fund to help cash-strapped day schools and yeshivas. It floated the idea of collecting money to help needy schools at a Jan. 7 meeting of educators that it convened at its Manhattan headquarters to discuss the poor economy and its effect on schools.

Jewish groups give Ryan's apology cool reception

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

It was the non-apology apology, as far as Jewish advocacy organizations were concerned.

Efforts by the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE) Ontario president Sid Ryan to make amends for his comparison of Israel in Gaza to the Nazis in Europe left Canadian Jewish Congress "frustrated."

"Ryan's apology for his anti-Semitic comparison of Jews and Israelis to Nazis would be far more welcome if he weren't persisting in his outrageous call for an academic boycott of Israelis," said Rabbi Reuven Bulka, co-president of Congress. "As a result, he continues to bring shame to CUPE Ontario."

More Gaza-related coverage
Pages 4,5, 9, 11, 16,18,22,27-29

B'nai Brith Canada dismissed the union leader's apology as a "public relations ploy.

"Sid Ryan's apology would only be meaningful if he chose to remove from consideration the proposed resolution to boycott Israeli academics," said Frank Dimant, B'nai Brith Canada's executive vice-president. "He fails to recognize the inherent contradiction of apologizing for his offensive remarks on the one hand, but refusing to accept on the other hand that the very same bias against Israel and its Jewish citizens is at the core of the proposed boycott resolution."

Ryan, an outspoken critic of Israel, lashed out at the Jewish state last week when he proposed "a ban on Israeli academics doing speaking, teaching or research work at Ontario universities as a protest against the Dec. 29, 2008 bombing of the Islamic University in Gaza… We are ready to say Israeli academics should not be on our campuses unless they explicitly condemn the university bombing and the assault in Gaza in general."

The resolution was originally proposed by CUPE Ontario's university workers committee.

Ryan later made the connection to the Nazis that infuriated Jews: "Attacking an institution of learning is just beyond the pale. They deliberately targeted an institution of learning. That's what the Nazis did."

Ryan's apology was published on CUPE National's website. It stated: "I was wrong to say what I did. It was never my intention to hurt or cause offense to anyone. I was attempting to draw attention to the terrible bombing of learning institutions. I got caught up in the emotion, and the comparison I used was hurtful and completely beyond the pale."

The bombing referred to by Ryan took place as Israeli ground troops entered Gaza to halt Hamas rocket attacks on Israel. Israeli sources say their soldiers came under fire from the university and they responded with mortar rounds. Palestinians say many civilians were killed. Israel Defence Forces spokespeople suggested secondary explosions caused by stored munitions and booby traps likely contributed to the death toll.

Sid Ryan

Ryan did not return calls from The CJN and a CUPE National spokesperson directed all inquiries to the union's Ontario wing. While CUPE National did not take a position on the proposed boycott, its national president, Paul Moist, wrote to Prime Minster Stephen Harper last week criticizing his government's position on the conflict.

"On behalf of the 570,000 members of CUPE, I am writing to demand that the Canadian government condemn the military assault on the people of Gaza that the State of Israel commenced on Dec. 26. CUPE condemns all acts of violence in the Middle East, including the Hamas rockets being launched into Israel and the Israeli offensive mentioned above. To date, your government has stated publicly your support for the Israeli people to protect themselves from attack. This is a woefully inadequate and frankly shameful response on behalf of Canadians."

The letter went on to demand that "the Canadian government, as a member nation of the UN, condemn the serious violations of humanitarian and international law by the State of Israel" and push for an immediate ceasefire.

Congress CEO Bernie Farber called Ryan's singling out of Jewish Israeli academics discriminatory against Jews. "Is he referring to Israeli Christians, Israeli Arabs or Druze?" Farber asked. "When Hamas was lobbing rockets into Israel, where was the call from Sid Ryan that academics from Gaza be boycotted."

"The proposed CUPE Ontario boycott based solely on Israeli citizenship is a clear violation of this principle [against discrimination] and flies in the face of free academic debate and tolerance for differing cultures and opinion," said Avi Benlolo, president of Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center.

Meanwhile, the University of Western Ontario announced it would not participate in a boycott of Israeli academics. Western president Paul Davenport told the London Free Press, "I'm very dismayed at the suggestion by CUPE that universities should boycott faculty from Israel. We believe in academic freedom… It is simply unwise to try to eliminate interactions among academics."

Following the 2006 Israel-Hezbollah war, the British University and College Union called for an academic boycott of Israeli institutions of higher learning. Although the proposal was eventually withdrawn after the union received legal advice against it, Canadian universities rejected the proposal.

"We specifically object to the scapegoating of any country's academics by those whose quarrel is with the policies of that country's government," University of Toronto president David Naylor stated at the time. Ryerson and York universities and the University of Toronto were also among many Canadian schools that rejected a boycott.

Ottawa commits $4M to aid Palestinians

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Ottawa is sending $4 million in humanitarian aid to the people of Gaza.

In a joint announcement last week on the Canadian International Development Agency's (CIDA) website, Bev Oda and Lawrence Cannon – ministers of international cooperation and foreign affairs, respectively – announced that Canada would send the money to help stem the "deteriorating humanitarian situation" in Gaza.

"Canada remains deeply concerned by the conflict and is committed to helping the innocent civilians affected by the violence in Gaza," Oda said.

CIDA will administer the aid package – $3 million of which is designated to support a UN appeal to "meet urgent needs" such as food, shelter and medical materials.

Associated sends out letter to parents

David Brown, president of Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto, the country's largest Jewish day school, sought to reassure parents in a letter sent out last week.

"As a result of recent events in Israel, security has become an even greater priority for Associated's leadership. To that end, we are in close contact with and following the recommendations being made by security specialists at UJA Federation and Canadian Jewish Congress who are continuously monitoring and assessing the communal security situation," he said.

He did not list new security measures in detail, except to note that "uniformed security personnel will be on duty" at Associated's three campuses.

One of those guards supervised drop-off procedures last Friday at the school's southern elementary campus.

Also last week, B'nai Brith Canada issued a country-wide security alert that called for heightened vigilance at Jewish institutions.

In a Jan. 8 news release, B'nai Brith said that there had been "a spike in incidents against Jews in Canada, including harassment and death threats. This comes amidst reports of violence abroad, notably the firebombing of a synagogue in Paris, and credible reports emerging that point to possible other global targets."

The document advised that Jewish institutions "ensure that proper security measures are in place at all times" and urged people to report suspicious activity to its anti-hate hotline.

Paul Goldenberg, U.S. national director of SCN, said organizations were advised to reassess their security with a particular emphasis on counter-surveillance measures.

"At this point in time, there is nothing imminent or specific" as far as threats against American Jewish institutions, said Goldenberg. But he said organizations were also advised to test their security systems and procedures by running simulations to ensure everyone fully understands them.

In Montreal, Rabbi Reuben Poupko, chair of the security co-ordinating committee for the Montreal Jewish community, said there is no need for alarm.

"We are in touch on a daily basis with all levels of the police, and CSIS, who have been extraordinarily co-operative and helpful, and there is no intelligence that there is a specific threat in Canada or Montreal," he said.

"All we are asking is that Jewish institutions review their existing security procedures and make sure everyone is up-to-date in how to use them."

Montreal police have increased patrols around Jewish sites, he added.

With files from JTA, Janice Arnold and Daniel Wolgelerenter.

Students at Leo Baeck Day School created posters in support of Israel, and raised more than $1,000 to benefit the Israel Connections Take a Break program, which provides tour buses for people under attack by Hamas rockets, to enable them to take a sightseeing tour. Jewish communities rally to support Israel

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Canadian Jews gathered last Thursday night at synagogues and community centres across the country to show their solidarity with Israel.

Rallies were held in Vancouver, Calgary, Winnipeg, London, Hamilton, Toronto, Ottawa, Montreal and Halifax. Rally-goers in Toronto saw a live satellite broadcast from Be'er Sheva in southern Israel, which was also shown via webcast at the other Canadian events.

In Toronto alone, an estimated 5,000-plus people filled the sanctuary and overflow seating at Beth Tzedec Congregation, where keynote speaker Alon Pinkas, a political commentator and former Israeli consul general in New York, stressed that Hamas is "not just a terrorist organization" or splinter group.

"This is the government of Gaza lobbing missiles, rockets and mortar shells every day on southern Israel."

Rally-goers at Beth Tzedec Congregation waved Israeli and Canadian flags to show their support for Israel [Frances Kraft photo]

Pinkas said Israel's "Cast Lead" operation in Gaza, which began late last month, should have been called "Push Came to Shove."

Israel's "sole military objective was to inflict on Hamas a punishing and overwhelming military strike, hopefully with the goal to significantly reduce their ability… and their willingness to launch rockets into Israel," Pinkas said.

Hamas is "the tip of a broader or wider conflict" with Iran, he added, emphasizing that "Hamas is an outpost of Iran. Have no doubt about it."

Israel's political objective, said Pinkas, is "to create a durable, sustainable, but more importantly, enforceable mechanism that would render Hamas' ability to even hold missiles impossible." It would require international assistance, he noted.

He added that it would be counterproductive for Israel to re-occupy the Gaza Strip.

Addressing media accusations of a disproportionate response by Israel, Pinkas suggested that military response should be proportionate "to the pain of the threat you're facing" rather than to pain inflicted.

"More Germans were killed in World War II than British. That didn't make the Germans right," he said.

"If it was all about quid pro quo, Israel would indiscriminately launch 3,000 missiles into Gaza, or would blow up buses or pizza parlours in Gaza."

Indicting Hamas for "stashing missiles and explosives in schools, hospitals, apartments and mosques," Pinkas said that "no children should be put on a balcony against people shooting at them.

"At the end of all this, there's going to have to be a political process," he said. "We're going to have to find a way to coexist."

Israel's consul general in Toronto, Amir Gissin, said Israel is fighting two wars: one on the ground in Gaza, and the other – a virtual war for public opinion – all over the world.

Gissin told the audience they could help win the virtual war. "Remember to spend the time on the Internet writing letters to the editor, commenting on articles you like or don't like. It makes a change. It makes people listen. It makes people read."

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, Beth Tzedec's senior rabbi, urged the crowd to "support Israel in any way you can," including planning a visit, and giving money for special relief.

Peter Kent, Canada's minister of state of foreign affairs, stressed that Canada continues to be "unequivocal in supporting Israel's right to defend itself against the continued attacks of Hamas."

He said the Canadian government is "urging the continued efforts of the international community to achieve an immediate, sustainable and durable ceasefire and would allow Israel to live beside its neighbours in peace without the threat of continued attacks.

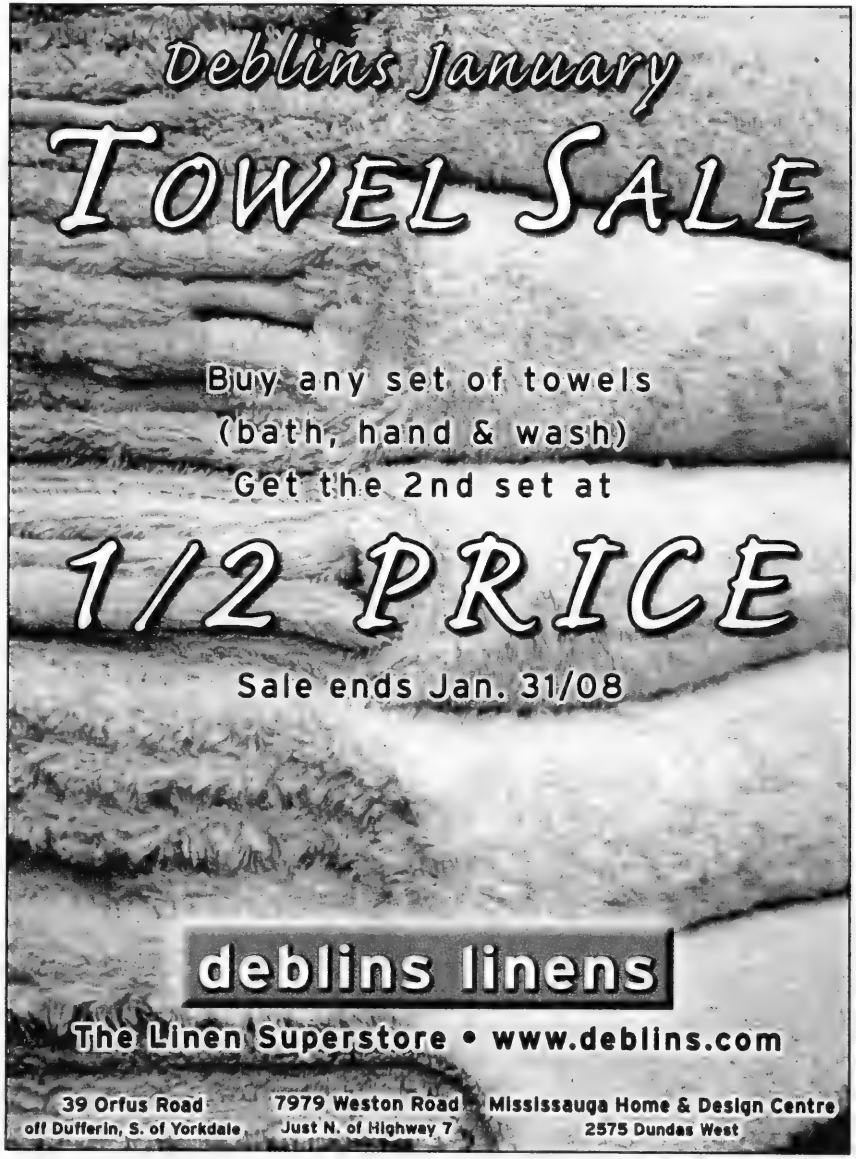
Kent, whose short speech was interrupted several times by applause, said that "our hearts go out" to all innocents who are suffering, on both sides of the conflict.

MC Julia Koschitzky said, "We want Israel to know we believe it has done everything possible to avert this latest crisis in Gaza, and that Israel has a right and responsibility to defend each and every one of its citizens."

In a pre-recorded interview with Yossi Tanuri, director general of UIA Federation Canada's Israel office, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said that Israel doesn't want much. "We just want that our children, our families, in every part of the country, will live in safety and security."

The Toronto event was organized by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy, Canadian Jewish Congress, the Canada Israel Committee and the Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee.

Federation has set up a southern Israel relief fund with proceeds to go to trauma relief programs, hotline counselling, respite for children and computers for youngsters to continue their schoolwork while not in class.



Jewish veterans memorial in Earl Bales scrapped

By RON CSILLAG
Special to The CJN

The Jewish War Veterans of Canada's (JVW) much-heralded memorial to Jewish soldiers, planned for Earl Bales Park, will be scrapped after years of inactivity.

A scaled-down version is slated to be built on the grounds of the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, the veterans say, adding that they're still fundraising.

The Toronto Post of the JVW admits that it's in disarray following a shake-up last year of its leadership. But the veterans say a memorial of some kind to Jews who served in the armed forces will be built.

Scaled-down version slated for Bathurst JCC

However, it will bear little or no resemblance to the project that was planned and widely publicized in 2005: an ambitious $7-million work of art to have been built by world-renowned architect Daniel Libeskind and dubbed Flames of Memory.

Set back from Bathurst Street on two acres of land donated by the City of Toronto, it was envisioned as a sweeping, curved structure resembling a chanukiyah that gradually ascended five storeys, topped by eight lights. Slicing through the middle was an arrow-like structure that would act as an eternal flame.

The project also called for a sunken amphitheatre to seat up to 200 people, ringed by two walls, one inscribed with names of Jewish war veterans from around the world, and the other to carry the names of battles in which Jews have fought, including those in Israel. The flags of 30 Allied nations and insignia of the various Canadian armed forces were to have flown.

Ground for the memorial was broken in October, 2005 in front of cabinet ministers, MPs, senators, MPPs, army and police brass, as well as Toronto Mayor David Miller, who called the project "the most significant war memorial erected in Canada in 50 years."

All that is now history, says Toronto councillor Mike Feldman, in whose ward, York Centre, the memorial was to have been built.

"It's pretty well scrapped," Feldman told The CJN. The veterans "weren't able to raise the money."

He called the project "overly ambitious."

The City of Toronto "was prepared to go ahead. But in order to protect the taxpayer, it had to have certain conditions met. [The Jewish war veterans] couldn't meet those conditions, because their fundraising was a bust."

Former JWV executive director Lou Van Delman said that since the project was launched, only about $700,000 of the $7 million has been raised, with most of that going for engineers, seed money and to pay Libeskind for his work to date.

The campaign included raising money for a $2-million endowment fund for maintenance and upkeep.

A sign soliciting funds for Flames of Memory still stands after more than three years in the north end of the park.

Feldman said the city has asked the JWV to take it down.

A new memorial is planned for the grounds of the Bathurst JCC, said the chair of the Toronto Post's board, Morey Eckler.

"It won't look the same [as the original]. I don't think it will be even close to what [Libeskind] proposed."

Eckler said whatever money was raised for the project is in an escrow account, but he didn't know how much that is. "We can't find the records."

He said the Toronto Post has experienced "difficulties" since Van Delman and former Toronto Post commander Hy Shulman were ousted last year.

In the meantime, "we're in the midst of getting rid of bad feelings in the community. It's a big job." The veterans are still soliciting donations, he added.

Feldman said he would like to see the JWV Toronto Post and the General Wingate Branch of the Royal Canadian Legion get together on a single project. "To have two separate groups is ridiculous."

He said this episode has left him "very disappointed," adding that the project's failure is "embarrassing for the Jewish community."

Arthur Drache, an Ottawa lawyer who specializes in tax law, said the JWV, as a registered charity, is entitled to keep whatever money it has raised to date.

"The money goes to the charity, not the project. The funds were not raised under false pretenses."

Neither Libeskind nor Toronto Post commander Norm Gardner were available for comment.

Ryan's rage

It is the intention of the Ontario wing of the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE) to pass a resolution at a union meeting next month that will urge universities across the country to ban "Israeli academics" who have not explicitly condemned Israel's actions in Gaza from "doing speaking, teaching or research work at Ontario universities."

The proposal is being promoted by CUPE Ontario president Sid Ryan. It was his outraged response last week to the Israel Defence Forces' destruction of a weapons lab in a university building in Gaza. Israel was shooting back at Hamas and their army of fighters.

"Attacking an institution of learning is just beyond the pale," Ryan said. "They deliberately targeted an institution of learning. That's what the Nazis did." Ryan's comparison of Israel and the Israel Defence Forces to the Nazis was vile and odious, but it was also quite revealing of the man. He apologized for the analogy, but the apology was justifiably suspected to be hollow and insincere. (Please see the related news story in this issue of the paper.)

Ryan is correctly upset at the violence and carnage in Gaza. So are we all. So, too, are we all moved and saddened by the terrible toll on the non-combatants in the area. But his accusatory, twitching finger of condemnation is pointed only at Israel. It points not at all, or ever, at the Hamas commanders and fighters who use "civilian" premises and places of worship as military redoubts, weapon laboratories and ordnance storage depots; who hide behind children and who fight mostly without uniform from the neighborhoods, houses and bedrooms of non-combatants.

Nor does Ryan seem bothered, nor has he ever seem bothered, by the fact that since it took control of Gaza, Hamas has deliberately targeted institutions of learning in southern Israel, such as schools, daycare centres and nurseries, as well as the homes, workplaces and play areas of all the ordinary citizens who live there. Such Hamas targeting is simply part of its national master plan, which includes, among other pithy sections, this rather jaunty justification for genocide: "Israel, by virtue of its being Jewish and of having a Jewish population, defies Islam and the Muslims."

No doubt Ryan is a man of soft heart and tender conscience, easily moved to rage and anger at the sight of injustice. But has he publicly expressed rage at, to take but three obvious and alas, ongoing examples, the government of Zimbabwe for the monstrous oppression of its own people, or the government of Sudan for the rape and slaughter in Darfur, or the government of Iran for the vicious victimization of its Baha'i and Kurdish population and – dare we say, too – for incessantly urging Israel be wiped off the map?

Ryan's selective expression of rage has knocked away the mask of outraged, angry social activist. What we see underneath is a more telling visage. By singling out Israeli academics for boycott, he joins forces with others who strive to demonize and delegitimize Israel, who do their best to separate the Jewish state from the family of nations.

Ryan's outrageous suggestion must be spurned even as he should be upbraided.

Letter from Israel

The following is a letter sent by my relatives in Israel recently. I thought your readers might appreciate how one family feels about present circumstances over there. Their three sons are in the Israel Defence Forces reserves.

"Dear Senta and Peter,

"Thank you for calling us.

"Yes, we are again in war. I remember my mother saying during the Six Day War – when Rami served in the army and she helped me at home with the children who were very young – 'This is not the last war.' I was so angry and asked her, 'How can you be so pessimistic?' But she was right.

"I stopped counting the wars and all the military operations during the years. We are exhausted and hope there will be better times. But Islam has another point of view. Let us hope the world will understand us this time and will give the right support. Lea and Rami Be'eri, Netanya, Israel."

Death knell for Hamas?

For eight years, Hamas has fired thousands of rockets into Israel, into civilian zones. Israel has finally said, "Enough."

Israel sent humanitarian aid into Gaza and dropped leaflets asking the civilians to evacuate certain areas before starting its land incursion to remove Hamas rocket-launching sites. Mosques and residential buildings have been found to house large caches of arms and explosives.

Since Hamas came to power in Gaza, it has built an infrastructure based on a military rather than a civilian foundation. If it was so concerned about the population of Gaza, why did Hamas not use its hundreds of tunnels from Egypt to transport food, water and medicine? Instead, the tunnels were used to smuggle in arms supplied by Iran.

What kind of governing body is Hamas to allow its people to go hungry so it can build rockets that it then hides in their homes. The civilians of Gaza are a human shield against any humane force that tries to remove Hamas from its enclave in the heart of the populace. Israel could eliminate the threat posed by Hamas easily. However, Israel tries to avoid civilian casualties.

Hamas has a death wish for Israel. Could this become the death knell for Hamas?

Harry J. Grunstein

Jews should protest loudly, too

As soon as Israel attacks any of its adversaries (read Gaza), there should immediately be a rally in front of the enemy's closest associate or surrogate embassies and consulates around the world. There are always photo-ops for anti-Semites and apologists and a disgusting percentage of left-wing press and sundry, sycophantic media in front of the Israeli (and Canadian, U.S., Australian) embassies, worldwide, no matter what day it is or who is being killed.

What is happening is that when Israel tries to neutralize its enemies, there is damage and deaths, including, collaterally, women and children, and the press constantly shows videos and stills of these scenes, without giving the same exposure to outraged voices and emotions from the Jewish side for balance.

It is time we reversed the game plan and showed up to protest just as loudly as the other side does, not at the Israeli embassy, but at the doorstep of our indiscriminate killers' and wounders' representatives, so that the same press will be forced to cover the story created by us being in the opponent's front yard, for a change, for all to see.

If we defend ourselves but don't protest and aren't seen as suffering, and don't get exposure for our plight, then we will continue to be thought of as arrogant and unconcerned about humanity. There has been an indoctrination perpetrated in front of us all by the newsbaggers who incessantly and obsessively, subliminally and overtly, carry the underdog message of the indigent Palestinians or the illegitimate mantra of the Arabs' displacement, but not that of our Jews.

Jews demonstrate on Palestinian side

I was at the demonstration in front of the Israeli consulate in Toronto on Dec. 28 and can testify to the presence of many Jews on the Palestinian side, as well as a group of Quakers ("Israeli offensive touches off protests in Canada," CJN, Jan. 1). We weren't noisy, but we were there.

In fact, we – a group of mostly Jewish women – have been holding a vigil in front of the Israeli consulate every Friday night for about eight years, against the occupation.

As for the pro-Israel side, I consider it highly significant that the only people who came out to defend the indefensible were members of the Jewish Defence League, and not even very many of them.

Hamas using human shields, report charges

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Hamas has made extensive use of Palestinian civilians as human shields in the current fighting in the Gaza Strip, says an Israeli report.

The 81-page report, compiled by the Intelligence and Terrorism Information Center, was released last week, just days before the Israeli army shelled a United Nations school in Gaza, resulting in the deaths of some 40 Palestinians.

An Israeli army spokesperson said that Hamas fighters, having barricaded themselves inside the school, fired mortar rounds at Israeli troops, prompting Israel to return the fire. The United Nations denied that Hamas personnel had been in the school.

The report was completed during the first week of Operation Cast Lead, launched by Israel on Dec. 27 after Hamas broke a six-month truce and fired a barrage of rockets and mortars into Israel.

Prepared with the assistance of the Israel Defence Force's Advocate General's Corps, the report says that Hamas has made "calculated" and "cynical" use of Palestinian civilians so as to sway public opinion in Gaza and blacken Israel's image in the international community.

Palestinians inspect a building that was destroyed by an Israeli air strike in Rafah, a town near the Gaza Strip's border with Egypt, on Jan. 8.

The centre, located north of Tel Aviv and headed by a retired Israeli colonel named Reuven Erlich, accuses Hamas of deliberately having established its military infrastructure in and around residential areas and eight densely populated refugee camps in Gaza, which is home to 1.5 million Palestinians.

Hamas' use of human shields was inspired by Hezbollah's tactics in Lebanon during the 2006 war. As the report states, "Hamas and other terrorist organizations copied and developed Hezbollah's warfare doctrine, which is based on exploiting the civilian population as human shields."

It adds, "Using civilians as human shields is a war crime, a grave breach of the laws of armed conflict and a crime against humanity."

Charging that Hamas has fired Qassam rockets and mortar shells at Israeli civilians from private homes, schools, mosques and hospitals, the centre says, "The rocket launching squads deliberately situate their launchers near houses to camouflage themselves and to protect themselves from the Israel Defence Forces. The attacks carried out by the terrorists only disrupt the daily lives of the Palestinian population and endanger them."

According to the centre, Hamas used similar tactics when the Israeli army raided Gaza in March 2008 and in October 2006.

It goes on to say that the Palestinians have paid a heavy price for Hamas' policy, which has turned civilians into virtual hostages and forced them into a situation of "unending combat" with Israel.

Citing a "fundamental contradiction" between the needs of Palestinian civilians and Hamas policies, the centre points out that Hamas has continually attacked Israeli crossing points, thereby interrupting the flow of food, water, medical supplies and petroleum into Gaza.

In addition, Hamas has targeted a nearby power plant in Ashkelon that provides Gaza with two-thirds of its electricity.

Justifying Israel's bombing of the Islamic University on Dec. 28, the centre says it housed a weapons research facility in which long-range rockets for use against Israel were developed.

The centre also claims that the majority of the workshops that manufacture rockets are in densely populated neighbourhoods.

"Situating them in the heart of the civilian population endangers the welfare of local residents, both because of 'work accidents' and because it exposes them to possible IDF attacks."

As well, the centre says, the extensive system of arms smuggling tunnels were built in urban settings, thereby exposing civilians to Israeli bombing raids.

And in contravention of international law and moral principles, Hamas has recruited children for operational missions, the report states.

In summation, the centre says, "Hamas' violent and deliberate attacks against Israeli civilians and civilian objects is accompanied by [its] equally callous disregard for the safety of Palestinian civilians... in Gaza.

"By launching attacks from within the confines of densely populated areas, by storing missiles and rocket launchers under mosques and homes, by using university facilities and other protected places to develop weapons and explosives, Hamas systematically abuses the protections afforded to civilians and civilian objects under international law, while placing the safety and welfare of these civilians at great risk."

Gaza collaborators face execution

By AMIRA HASS
© Ha'retz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Since the aerial attack on Gaza began, Hamas has sought to suppress individuals it believes endanger the group's fight against Israel and its hold on power in the strip, as well as public morale. Prime targets include Fatah members, people convicted or suspected of collaborating with Israel, and "common" criminals.

"Hamas rules with an iron fist even now," said one resident. A political activist who says he supports neither Hamas nor Fatah said that given the difficult conditions created by the ongoing shelling and ground invasion, Hamas is likely to try to prevent collaborators or those suspected to be from working with Israel.

Since the operation began on Dec. 27, Hamas operatives have executed several people that it classified as collaborators. Members of the group have confirmed the executions took place and said the victims had admitted giving information to the Shin Bet security service that resulted in the deaths of Palestinians or had already been sentenced to death by a Palestinian military court, but the sentences were delayed for various reasons.

Independent sources said that among the dead were those not known publicly to have been collaborators, as well as others long suspected of co-operation with Israel, or those arrested and later released.

Estimates of the number of suspects executed range from 40 to 80, but amid the prevailing conditions – shelling, fear of walking the streets and media blackouts – it's virtually impossible to verify the numbers or identities of the dead.

Executions are carried out secretly. In Rafah, for example, at least some of the victims were killed in a caravan erected in the area formerly occupied by the Rafiah Yam settlement, and the victims' relatives were invited to take away the bodies.

Even in the current conditions, Hamas is continuing to arrest those it suspects of criminal activity or Fatah membership, many of whom were arrested on the eve of the Israel Defence Forces operation and fled detention when the shelling began. No one knows where the detained are being held.

Independent sources and those linked with Fatah say Hamas' common methods include confiscating cellphones, beatings, house arrest and firing at a suspect's legs.

Fatah members say Hamas is following a policy dictated by its leadership and directed against Fatah as a whole. An official in Gaza's Hamas-run interior ministry told Ha'aretz that the steps were taken only against Fatah members who expressed "happiness" at the aerial attack and even "distributed candy" in the streets as it began. An independent source corroborated Hamas' account.

Opinions

In defence of Israel

It's very hard to read letters to the editor or to listen to radio talk shows in which people rant and rave against Israel. The things they say about Israel seem so far-fetched, so outrageous that surely no one agrees with them. But the sad fact is that many do agree. Many find the rhetoric of hate reasonable and suggestive. The comparison of the Israeli Defence Forces to Nazi soldiers might seem revolting and utterly fallacious to us, but there are some who find it accurate and comforting.

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

So what do we do about it?

Do we wring our hands in pain and worry? Do we bemoan the lack of hasbarah – proper Israeli public relations and explanation? Do we lay the blame on the State of Israel? If we do that, making only Israel responsible, then we are like the enemy, finding fault with Israel and giving everyone else a free ride in this complex world of propaganda and war.

It seems clear at times that Hamas and their sympathizers have won the war of words. They were designated terrorists and are now called victims. How did they turn the tables on us? The major world powers listed them as a key terrorist organization. Funds to them were not allowed on charitable lists. Now everyone wants to weep for them as they hide behind children and in hospitals.

The IDF has done a remarkable job defending Israel after Hamas broke the ceasefire and fired rockets into civilian areas. The newspapers reported it clearly. Israeli and U.S. government spokespeople reiterated these facts often. So where is popular opinion?

Most people, I believe, aren't fooled. Yet, the more they are bombarded by these words of victimization and pity for Palestinians, the more they will be swayed, or at least be less supportive of Israel.

So what must you and I do?

Stand up and be counted! How? Defend Israel with your words. Speak out. I know it's not easy. The opportunities are not convenient or welcoming. It means putting yourself out there for ridicule and even hostility. It sometimes means getting involved with loud and rude people. It means being in uncomfortable situations. It means knowing what's going on.

But we should know the facts. We should be the spokespeople. We know that Israel did not initiate, but only reacted. We should know that Israel is protecting its citizens. We should know that Israel withdrew from Gaza and left the land to Hamas, and it is, therefore, responsible for the horrid conditions. Hamas chose to spend resources on rockets rather than medical supplies, on warriors rather than doctors.

Israel is defending itself as best it can. We should defend it as best we can.

Two lives, two legacies

At the beginning of January, two people, in two very different parts of the world, died. Both were consumed by passion for a cause.

Helen Suzman will be remembered as one of the few white South African politicians to oppose the odious theology of apartheid. She served in South Africa's parliament for 36 years, again and again challenging the country's leaders on their oppression of the black majority in that country.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

She was a close friend of Nelson Mandela, visiting him and other opponents in prison and enduring years of taunts, obscene phone calls and threats to her life.

Many Jewish South Africans who also opposed apartheid voted with their feet, leaving the country during its years of distress – and enriching Israeli and Canadian Jewish communities in doing so.

But Suzman, born to Lithuanian Jewish parents who immigrated to South Africa, stayed the course. While not a fan of the worldwide boycott of her country, since she believed it harmed the very people it was intended to help, nevertheless she was at all times an outspoken critic of this policy of exclusion and lived to see it dismantled.

Her passion for justice never failed. Not content with helping to end apartheid, she remained a critic of the recent government, which fostered outlandish ideas about AIDS and continued to support the terrible Robert Mugabe in Zimbabwe.

The same week that she died, another person passed into history. Nizar Rayan was killed during the first phase of Israel's attack on Gaza and its Hamas leadership.

Rayan was also passionate – passionate about his hatred of Israel. He was, according to reports, a "hardline theologian and military commander."

Give him his due. He believed passionately that Hamas leaders should live among the people openly – unlike many who apparently live in hiding, coming out only to shoot rockets or people. He believed so passionately in the cause of Israel's destruction that he sent his own 22-year-old son as a suicide bomber into Israel, and to certain death. His surviving son reportedly remains "committed to the resistance."

Rayan fought with his own troops, according to press accounts of his death, and was an "iconic" figure, revered for his passionate and total commitment to the destruction of Israel. He died along with many family members and at least two of his four wives in the Jabaliya refugee camp.

Consider these two lives and the passion each felt for the causes they espoused.

Suzman committed her life to creating a more just society in her homeland. When it was physically dangerous to do so, she spoke out when terrible things happened, including the murder of black activist Steve Biko – a death that she insisted had to be examined. Even after leaving parliament, she helped oversee the first multiracial elections in South Africa and was proud to be deemed an enemy by Mugabe.

Today, South Africa, for all its problems, is a place she was proud to call home. It owes her much.

Rayan, too, was proud to be a fighter against the state he perceived as the enemy, even sacrificing his own son in a bizarre parody of the Christian belief in atonement through the crucifixion.

But what is Rayan's monument? Continued warfare, a failed and ruined Gaza that's incapable of feeding its own people and that's spending aid money only for rockets with which to terrorize Israel.

And why did Rayan die in a refugee camp? Years after Hamas took over the Gaza Strip, why are there still camps, instead of more homes, farms and businesses?

Even the ability of Gaza residents to work in such shared places as the Erez industrial area was taken away due to attacks. Greenhouses left by evacuated settlers were destroyed, not revitalized.

The Jewish icon of passion for a cause was Pinchas, who upon seeing an Israelite man copulating with a Midianite woman drove his spear through them both, thus supposedly earning the priesthood. But the rabbis were very quick to declare that his was a one-time act, not to be repeated.

Halachah, not individual passion, was to drive rabbinic Judaism.

The rabbis wisely realized that passion for a cause that's not contained by moral codes would quickly lead to chaos.

On writing a column

There are many reasons why writers choose to put their ideas and opinions into words and share them with others. Whether they engage in formal writing in books, academic journals, newspapers or even blogs or whether they share their thoughts in private letters or e-mails, a writer usually works in isolation and does not always know the impact that his or her work has on readers. Writing can be a solitary occupation

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

Over the years, I have done a significant amount of writing in both my professional and personal life. When it comes to letters, e-mails and speeches, the response from readers or listeners is usually clear. Phone calls, replies or questions can be almost immediate.

Since newspapers include columns from a variety of contributors, as well as photographs, announcements and advertisements, it is almost impossible to know which articles subscribers choose to read in any given edition. The kinds of articles written, including news features, announcements and editorial opinions, their location and headlines all influence whether a person will take the time to read what someone has spent time writing.

In my CJN columns, I have primarily written about Jewish issues, but also Canadian issues that transcend our particular community. I have often focused on legal issues and topics of important societal concern. But each time, I am always mindful of a central objective or mission – namely, whether readers of The CJN would find my narrative to be clear, interesting, and informative while I address some of the challenging issues that we, as a community, face every day. All this in just 700 words.

The responses that I have received after the publication of each article have been interesting. After almost five years and more than 50 columns, I continue to receive e-mails and phone calls from people who wish to engage me in further discussion with respect to the issues I have raised. These personal comments made to me by friends, relatives and regular CJN readers, as well as leaders of our organized Jewish community who have been particularly interested in the various topics I have covered, are valuable. This feedback has been most gratifying, and it makes the entire process worthwhile.

Although I write for a variety of audiences, I am particularly pleased to contribute to a national Jewish forum that reaches Jewish communities across our country. The CJN is a well-prepared, professionally edited account of key events and issues confronting Canadian Jews. It offers a vehicle to keep abreast of current events and opinions in the Jewish community both here in Canada and abroad.

It is true that most of the domestic news and almost all of the paid advertisements in The CJN are directed at a central Canadian audience. This is not surprising, considering that the majority of the Canadian Jewish population resides in central Canada – namely, Ontario and Quebec.

Jews in smaller communities across Canada often suffer from a lack of resources and receive little attention or support from the majority of Canadian Jews. These communities often feel isolated. At one time, the Canadian Jewish Congress had a small-communities committee, but this no longer exists. The present leadership of Congress, however, is seriously committed to addressing the issue of the declining smaller communities. Local publications, printed (for example, the Edmonton Jewish News) and online (such as the Jewish Pipeline) do provide information and a sense of belonging to individuals in some smaller communities.

While Alberta has a dynamic and thriving Jewish community of more than 10,000 people, I meet very few people here who subscribe to The CJN. The CJN does include some information about distant communities, but, more importantly, it provides a way for people in outlying areas to feel connected to a greater Canadian Jewish community.

The contributions of regional columnists from across Canada have become a vehicle for sharing the views of and uniting members of our community from coast to coast. In short, The CJN serves as a national voice of Canadian Jewry.

So, when this columnist puts his ideas and opinions into written words, the objective is not only to inform the readers and encourage further thought, but also to contribute to this national voice.

The Kirshner File

Israel strives for 'a new reality' in the region

As Israeli armour and infantry thrust deeper into the teeming Gaza Strip last week in a concerted attempt to inflict still more crippling blows against Hamas after a punishing one-week air campaign, Israel announced it would not return to the status quo ante. Three weeks after Hamas aggressively broke an already shaky six-month ceasefire and thereby invited the wrath of an unfettered Israeli military response, Israel made it clear that the rules of the game had irrevocably changed.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Amid shortages of food, water and medical supplies in the besieged Gaza Strip and a growing civilian toll, Israel firmly rebuffed increasingly frantic calls by the United Nations, the European Union and the Arab world for an immediate truce. Israel's rationale, supported by the vast majority of its citizenry and the Diaspora, was that if Israel acceded to these international pleas and abruptly halted Operation Cast Lead, it would have achieved little of lasting significance and only strengthened the hand of Hamas and its radical, rejectionist allies, Iran and Hezbollah.

Hamas, the Islamic Resistance Movement, must be held fully responsible and accountable for the latest round of fighting. Hamas, which opposes a two-state solution and thus Israel's very existence, brought this tragic and avoidable conflict upon itself by breaking the ceasefire that Egypt had laboriously produced.

Hamas – which violently seized control of Gaza from the Palestinian Authority in a coup in June 2007 and then proceeded to transform it into an armed camp – did not lift a finger to enforce the truce. The blinkered, ideologically bound leaders of Hamas permitted smaller factions, such as Islamic Jihad, to sporadically shell Israeli communities and allowed armed fighters to try to infiltrate the border fence. And as always, Hamas continued to import Iranian long-range rockets, arms and munitions through a maze of tunnels from Egypt. Amid these provocations, Israel acted with relative restraint.

This past November, in the first such incident of its kind since the truce went into effect on June 19, Israel and Hamas clashed in a direct confrontation after Israeli troops destroyed a tunnel perilously close to the border. Israel had a well-founded fear that Hamas intended to use it to abduct yet more Israeli soldiers. It will be recalled that Israel launched its last big incursion into Gaza, in June 2006, after Hamas attacked an Israeli outpost and kidnapped Cpl. Gilad Schalit, who remains imprisoned despite Israel's best efforts to free him.

As a result of last November's flareup, Hamas abandoned the ceasefire, such as it was, and began firing hundreds of short and long-range missiles at Israel. On Dec. 25, Christmas Day, 80 such projectiles hit Israel. Israel's outgoing prime minister, Ehud Olmert, issued a dire warning, saying that devastating consequences lay in store if Hamas did not cease and desist. Meanwhile, in Cairo, Israel's foreign minister, Tzipi Livni, told Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak that Israel's patience was wearing thin. "Enough is enough," she declared, saying that the situation had become unbearable and intolerable.

Several months prior to Livni's appearance in Cairo, Defence Minister Ehud Barak warned Hamas that "a serious operation" into Gaza – an invasion – could be expected if Hamas did not come to its senses.

Willfully ignoring Barak's warning, Hamas let the ceasefire run out. Hamas was intoxicated by its warped and arrogant assumption that Israel would step back from the brink before invading Gaza, a poor, congested sliver of land that Israel unilaterally relinquished in 2005 and which is populated by 1.5 million Palestinians, the majority of whom are refugees from previous Arab-Israeli wars.

Israel launched the first phase of Operation Cast Lead on Dec. 27, explaining that no self-respecting country on earth could tolerate a next-door terrorist entity threatening and endangering its civilian population. Hamas was aware of the possible consequences, Israel having declared war on Hamas in 2004 after assassinating its supreme leader, Ahmed Yassin. Egypt, Jordan and the Palestinian Authority, their obligatory verbal blasts against Israel notwithstanding, rightfully blamed Hamas for igniting the latest round of fighting.

This time, Israel means business. For one week, the Israeli Air Force and navy bombed strategic and symbolic targets in Gaza, blasting rocket launchers, weapons storage depots, metal work shops, smuggling tunnels, government buildings, communication facilities, and the legislature. The homes of top-ranking Hamas officials were also targeted, and among the commanders Israel killed was Nizar Rayyan, who once brazenly said, "We will never recognize Israel. There is nothing called Israel, neither in reality nor in the imagination."

As well, Israel bombed mosques and civilian buildings where weapons were deliberately stored. In reckless fashion, Hamas placed them there to score propaganda points against Israel.

In an attempt to avert a humanitarian crisis, Israel permitted convoys of trucks bearing food, water, medicine and fuel into Gaza. But Israel cordoned off Gaza to journalists, correctly fearing that stark and disturbing images of injured and dead Palestinians and of gutted buildings would play into Hamas' hands and force it to agree to a premature ceasefire.

Despite the bombing sorties, which claimed the lives of hundreds of Palestinian fighters and civilians, Hamas continued firing rockets and mortars at Israel, killing three civilians. Some of the missiles struck long-suffering localities such as Sderot and Ashkelon, but others reached as far as Ashdod, Be'er Sheva and Yavne, validating Israeli fears that Hamas had vastly improved and upgraded its arsenal during the six-month calm.

Unable to deal effectively with this vexing problem by air power alone, Israel initiated the second phase of its offensive with a ground invasion on Jan. 3. In what was described as fierce fighting in northern and eastern Gaza, Israel captured largely uninhabited areas where rockets and mortars have been launched. And in a replay of the urban warfare Israel conducted in southern Lebanon in the summer of 2006 and in the West Bank in the spring of 2002, Israel expanded and deepened its operation by attacking fortifications, bunkers and crowded neighbourhoods. Nevertheless, Israel was unable to deliver a knock-out blow and Hamas remained standing, pummeling Israeli towns as far away as Gedera, which is only 30 kilometres from Tel Aviv. Last week, the Home Front Command suggested that Rehovot and Rishon LeZion are also within rocket range.

In this war of self defence against the forces of Islamic radicalism, Israel wants to "change the equation" and create "a new reality" in the region, as Livni and Barak have succinctly explained. Israel's short-term objective is to restore tranquility in the south so that 900,000 Israelis can live in peace and not be intimidated by Hamas rocketry. In this connection, Israel seeks a durable and permanent ceasefire based on a new and rigorous monitoring system. (The Israeli government should not lift its current blockade of Gaza until Hamas recognizes Israel, renounces terrorism and accepts agreements signed by Israel and the Palestinian Authority. With Hamas implacably hostile to Israel, Olmert can safely dismiss Hamas' demand to extend the truce to the West Bank.)

Beyond these aims, Israel's objectives should be to disable, if not destroy, Hamas' military infrastructure. In addition, Israel should attempt to weaken the aggressive and irresponsible Hamas government in Gaza – which has brought only misery, hardship and bloodshed to its people – and to reassert its deterrent power following the inconclusive war in Lebanon.

Israel cannot afford to lose this war, because anything less than a victory will be interpreted by Hamas as a defeat and embolden its cocky allies, Hezbollah and Iran.

So a hasty ceasefire can wait. Hamas must be crushed. But will the international community grant Israel sufficient time, understanding and leeway to do what is absolutely necessary?

A solution to your declining RRSP.

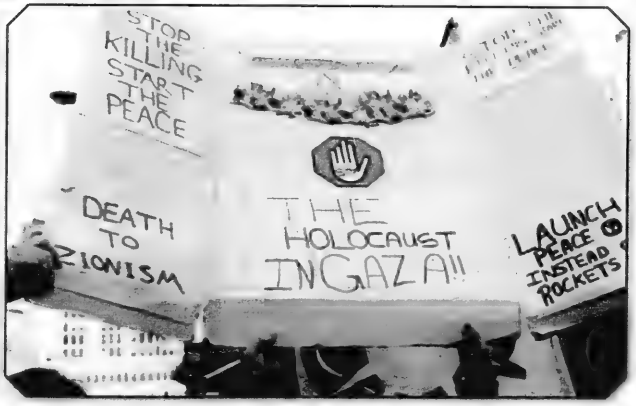
Toronto's Anti-Israel Protest

A Picture is Worth a Thousand Words

Recently, protestors against Israel's military action to stop nearly eight years of Hamas missile attacks against southern Israel, gathered in downtown Toronto. Although opposition to Israel's actions represents a legitimate point of view in a democratic society, several signs condemned Jews, Zionism and even Israel's existence, in addition to comparing Israel's military activities to the Holocaust.



UJA supports the people of Southern Israel

Special programs meet urgent needs of besieged residents

By Daniel Horowitz

As Israel's military action against Hamas in Gaza continues, residents from Israel's southern region continue to be targets of Hamas missiles. Close to one million Israelis are now in the range of missiles from Gaza, and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, through UIA Federations Canada (UIAFC), continues to assist these terror victims through initiatives in both Toronto, and in Israel.

Together with its partner agencies and dozens of community sponsors, UJA Federation held a successful rally last week at Beth Tzedec Congregation, where thousands of local residents stood in solidarity with the people of Israel, while denouncing terrorism. As the situation in Israel intensified, UJA also initiated its Southern Israel Relief Fund which has already raised more than $50,000. Funds raised will be distributed by UIAFC.

UJA and UIAFC are also on the ground in Israel working with local communities in this time of crisis. Below is a partial list of funded initiatives that are helping the people of Israel's southern region:

- The Community Outreach Unit of Natal – Israel Trauma Centre for Victims of Terror and War - is currently providing community based crisis intervention services for municipal and social services workers, new immigrants and the mentally handicapped throughout the region, many of whom are exhibiting signs of post traumatic stress disorder (PTSD).

- A group of youth from the UJA–funded Etgarim program in Sderot that offers youth at risk outdoor activities was welcomed at a community centre in Kiryat Shmona in northern Israel. Since then, children from the embattled region and their families have be given a respite from the constant rocket attacks, by being sent north to spend time at Canada Centre in Metulla where they can engage in sports activities including hockey, swimming and table-tennis.

- 1,500 young people from rocket-ravaged Sderot and Be'ersheva have been taken on day outings away from the region. The goal is to take 7,000 children to remove them from the constant sense of anxiety that they are forced to endure.

- A group of Ethiopian families – over 50 people – traveled to Eilat to get away from the stress of the constant missile attacks. UJA Federation partners arranged for meals and activities for the group.

- UJA/UIAFC Ayalim projects – student villages that encourage young adults to study and live in peripheral areas in Israel - have been very active in offering their support. Yachini Village, a few minutes away from Sderot, sent its youngest students, 19 year-olds who defer their IDF service for a year in order to volunteer and give back to the community, along with some of their students to volunteer in Sderot.

- CIE Birthright Israel groups visited Bat Yam recently, and together with Ethiopian youth members, prepared "goody bags" to be distributed amongst the bomb shelters in Sderot and the surrounding region.

- As a result of school being cancelled for close to 200,000 youngsters in the region, students are being provided with computers to enable them to participate in online classes and studies.

Additional aid is being sent to the region's most vulnerable, including the disabled and the elderly.

UJA's other partners in Israel, the Joint American Jewish Distribution Committee (JDC) and the Jewish Agency (JAFI) have expanded their support in the region. The JDC will provide more case workers for 25,000 elderly and disabled residents. The Jewish Agency will provide 23,500 children with respite trips away from the conflict zone, purchase computers for children so they can continue schoolwork, provide supplies and provisions for bomb shelters, and provide counseling and therapy for immigrants housed in absorption centers.

United Jewish Appeal is already providing more than $2 million dollars in urgent assistance to the rocket stricken residents of Sderot, through UIA Federations Canada. To contribute to the Southern Israel Relief Fund, please visit www.jewishtoronto.com and click on the Relief Fund icon.

A young boy from Sderot is greeted by youth volunteers in Metulla, in northern Israel. The youngster was sent to Metulla with others from the rocket-stricken city of Sderot, as a respite trip funded by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, through UIA Federations Canada.

Children from the Sderot region enjoy some time in Metulla's Canada Centre.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Jewish Life

Every Jew has a name

By RABBI AVRAHAM PLOTKIN

Rabbinic Reflections

A young Jewish mother walks her son to the school bus on his first day of preschool.

"Please behave, my bubaleh," she says.

"Take good care of yourself and think about your mother who is waiting for you, tataleh!"

"And come right back home on the bus, my shepseleh."

"Remember, your mommy loves you a lot, my sweeteleh!"

At the end of the school day, the bus returns. She runs to her son and hugs him.

"So what did the love of my life learn on his first day of school?" she asks.

"I learned my name is David," is the boy's response.

This week, in synagogues around the world, we will all begin reading a brand new book, the second book of the Torah called Shmot, which is literally translated as the book of "Names." The reason for this unusual name is that the book happens to open up with the word "names" in its opening line: "Now these are the names of the children of Israel…" (Exodus 1:1).

This is quite intriguing. Why name an entire book after a seemingly coincidental word in the opening line? Wouldn't it be more logical to name it after its storyline, or as it is referred to in most English bibles simply as the Book of Exodus?

But perhaps there is an important lesson here. The second book of the Torah introduces us to the new nation of Israel, a nation that in a short period of time in Egypt, transformed and proliferated from the small family of Jews in the first book of Genesis into the quantitatively fruitful nation in the new book of "Names."

Yet, despite this amazing numeric growth, the Torah reminds us not to forget that each individual person has a name and must be recognized and respected. Maturing into a large nation should not translate into, God forbid, neglecting the needs of the individual, treating him or her like a number or statistic.

If there is anything we can learn from the present war in Israel, it is precisely that every Jew has a name. We, as a people, are ready to risk our lives and put our children in harm's way just to save the life of even one person living in Sderot or any other part of Israel. To me, the current war in Israel underscores the principle of kol yisrael arevim zeh lazeh – every Jewish person is responsible for the other. A Jew in the north must defend the Jew in the south and vice versa. All of Israel will come to the defence of a few Jews, no matter how few, to save them from rockets or any other form of assault. This is what makes us all so proud of being Jewish – our amazing commitment to save the life of even a single Jew. Every Jew truly has a name!

I happened to be standing at a recent prayer gathering for the people of Israel beside a father of an Israeli soldier. We were sharing a Book of Psalms. I listened carefully as he whispered the ancient words of King David and pronounced each word so carefully and with so much concentration.

I looked at the tears in his eyes and thought to myself how I would feel if this was my own child on the frontlines of battle. Then it dawned on me that, in fact, this was my child. This child was fighting for my survival and for the future of all of the Jewish people. He is not just another soldier. He has a name, and I can never forget that.

A little more than a month ago, the world was shocked by the brutal murders at the Chabad centre in Mumbai, and especially the murders of Rabbi and Rebbetzin Holtzberg, emissaries of the Lubavitcher Rebbe of blessed memory.

One of the points that I believe really endeared the Holtzbergs to people who never met them was their commitment to every single Jew, even in remote Mumbai. They gave unconditional love to a travelling Israeli soldier or a North American businessperson as if they were their own children. They understood very well the principle that every Jewish person is indispensible to the well-being of the entire people of Israel, and they lived and died for that cause.

We must all learn from the Holtzbergs' example to embrace every single Jew in our own community and take care of their material and spiritual needs as if they were our own children. They are all individuals with names, indispensible parts of our nation and our future depends on them.

IDEAS ON IDENTITY

By Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

"Should old acquaintance be forgot…"

It's January 2009 – a brand new (secular) year. Unless you live in Israel, this secular new year is your new year, too. Unless you write 5769 in your chequebook, it's safe to assume that you'll be writing 2009 and "Judazing" the change of year in January by wishing your co-workers a "happy and healthy…"

Just short of saying Shanah Tovah, we are caught up in the real world of living in the Diaspora during all of December and into the first weeks of January.

Chanukah and Christmas coming on each other's heels this year made it all one big mish-mash of a "holiday season." We can build all the Sukkahs we want in the fall, but it's those stringed lights across the street that shine in our windows through most of December that frame our existence in Canada.

So I can't help but be glad that we Jews have not one, but two opportunities during the course of a year to think about change, redirection and new beginnings.

Yes, there are drunken parties on Dec. 31, and yes, the "holiday" has its excesses. But most of us are thoughtful folks who can make new year's resolutions six months after we've made new year's resolutions and do a winter stock-taking that will ask us if we've kept those well-intentioned pledges we made on Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur.

Maybe the secular new year gives us a second chance to make good on the promises of Kol Nidre before next Kol Nidre tells us that it's too late.

I don't growl at people who wish me a happy new year in January. I see them as messengers of the reminder that I still have work to do to complete the change that I promised myself one long day in synagogue back in October.

At the best of times, most people don't seek change. It took us millions of years to evolve into who and what we are now.

The human disposition and the human body doesn't like change. Neanderthal man didn't wake up one day and say, "Gee, I'd like to move on and become Cro-Magnon man." Look at your kids: when their bodies make big changes in adolescence, it makes them moody and tense.

As much as we might crave excitement, we generally like to know what comes next. As much as we love to travel, we like to come home to our own beds. We are creatures of habit. People like things just the way they are, so any resolutions we make about change – especially about change that takes hard, inner work – will be tough, and we will procrastinate and avoid and make excuses.

So another "reminder" is not all that bad. Facing our "change demons" twice a year is twice as hard, but it gives us two chances to move forward in our lives.

So make those resolutions once again, and happy new year once again.

Money Matters

By Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

With the drop in net worth that many have experienced, I had planned to write about the need for even greater efforts of tzedakah. With so many more needy people and many organizations suffering heavy financial losses, those who are in a position to do so should dig a little deeper and share a greater percentage of their wealth.

For many, the idea of being able to lose money in the markets would be a great blessing – indicating that they actually have money to invest. How fortunate are those who donated large sums of money, thereby helping so many before they had the opportunity to lose those sums in the markets.

Unfortunately, along came Bernie Madoff – isn't it amazing how prescient names can be? – who has the apparent ignominy of singlehandedly losing somewhere in the neighbourhood of $600,000,000 to $1 billion dollars (US) in charitable funds, not to mention the billions of dollars lost by individuals, many of whom were among the largest Jewish philanthropists.

Compounding the losses is the fact that many organizations which lost money didn't even know they were investing with Madoff. Rather, they invested with third parties that turned around – at times without the knowledge of the organizations – and invested in what we now know to be the world's largest Ponzi scheme.

Corruption, fraud, cutting corners and lack of full disclosure are symptoms of human greed and the desire for riches. And these symptoms don't confine themselves to the corporate boardroom. They extend to the world of philanthropy as well. The same people who can be involved in so much good can at the same time fall victim to – let's be charitable here – unprofessional conduct.

The financial system, by its very nature, is built on trust. Once that trust evaporates, the system collapses. This loss of trust is the underlying cause of the current credit crisis, with lenders afraid they may not be able to collect on their loans.

Because many charities are run informally, lacking the checks and balances one would typically find in a well-run business, it's even more imperative that only the people of the highest integrity be involved in the charitable sector.

"One should not give even a prutah [a penny] to the communal charity purse unless it is under the supervision of a person [as honest as] Rabbi Chananyah ben Teradyon" (Bava Batra 10b). The Talmud relates how Rabbi Chananyah, when he was the trustee for charitable funds, paid from his pocket for monies that were inadvertently used for different charitable purposes.

It's noteworthy that the Torah consistently uses the expression "and you shall fear God" in the context of our monetary dealings and never in the context of "rituals." True fear of God is a guarantee of an efficient and honest marketplace. The need for fear of a higher authority is especially true in areas where one is forced to rely on the assessments and judgment of others – where by its very nature, it's impossible to tell whether one is acting in good faith or only claiming to be doing so. Only God truly knows if your stockbrokers' advice was given for your benefit or their own.

It takes much more moral strength to be a pious businessman than to be a pious religious leader. Our rabbis are most effusive in praising those who toil honestly to support themselves.

Only the truly pious fully appreciate that – notwithstanding hard work, talent and ingenuity – whatever success they achieve is a blessing from God. It's a blessing that must be shared with others at all times, and especially when economic times are tough.

After Madoff

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The fallout from the Bernard Madoff affair is well-known. Scores of investors, including major U.S. Jewish organizations, have lost tens of millions of dollars. [tinyurl.com/madoff12]

Canadian charities have not escaped Madoff, with the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto reporting a modest $486,000 hit. [tinyurl.com/madoff17]

The Jewish Highway

The question many charities and donors are now asking is, "What's next for Jewish fundraising?"

Writing in the Wall Street Journal, Lucette Lagnado asks, "When the Big Spenders Fail, Who Will Save Jewish Charity?" She looks at how in recent years, Jewish federations in the United States have focused on "top end" donors because it seemed more cost effective than going after small donors. In 1988, the federations had 814,000 donors. By 2007, donors dropped below half a million. Lagnado suggests that this scandal presents an opportunity to strengthen community ties – and bring back once ubiquitous pushkes into our homes. [tinyurl.com/madoff13]

Rebecca Spence continues that theme in Forward.com. "Now, observers predict, Jewish groups will increasingly take their cue from the more grass-roots, web-based fundraising efforts that proved so successful in the campaign of president-elect Barack Obama.

'People are going to pay a lot of attention to the way Mr. Obama raised money and that ability to aggregate donors,' said Jonathan Sarna, a professor at Brandeis University, 'some of whom have felt that they were perhaps not as welcomed by these charities, which paid more attention to older donors.'" [tinyurl. com/ madoff03]

Rabbi Marc Gellman focuses on the toll the scandal has taken on the organizations and the community at large in an open letter to Madoff in Newsweek. "There must be some new word invented to describe the way you have redefined betrayal. The Bible calls such things a toevah, an abomination. It means an act so alien to our values and our natures that it cannot be understood or explained. You have committed an abomination." [tinyurl.com/madoff18]

Bradley Burston writes in Ha'aretz that Madoff "has managed to harm contemporary Jewry in ways anti-Semites could only dream about." [tinyurl.com/madoff10] In fact, the Anti-Defamation League says that hateful comments have been appearing on popular newspaper sites, blogs and message boards on the Internet. The ADL has reprinted a handful of them on its website, including this user comment, which appeared in the Palm Beach Post website: "Just another jew money changer thief. It's been happening for 3,000 years. Trust a jew and this is what will happen. History has proven it over and over and over. Jews have only one god – money." [tinyurl.com/madoff16]

Andrew Silow-Carroll, editor-in-chief of the New Jersey Jewish News, warns about wasting a lot of communal energy "if we spend much time worrying what they think." Rather, Jewish leaders "should take a long, hard look at the overlapping, and even redundant, agencies and projects in Jewish life" and they "should be grateful for the generosity of the very wealthy, but without allowing the machers' riches to place them above scrutiny." [tinyurl.com/madoff15]

The Madoff scandal is changing daily. To follow the story, I recommend checking out Forward.com and ejewishphilanthropy.com, along with the New York Times Topic devoted to Madoff. [tinyurl.com/madoff08] Forward.com has published a list tallying Jewish communal losses [tinyurl.com/madoff07] and the Wall Street Journal has been updating its list of all investors. [tinyurl.com/madoff09]

Although he has suffered no direct losses, I came upon one other person whose life has been changed by the scandal: Chicago lawyer Ari "no-relation-to-Bernard" Madoff. "My wife and I are expecting our first kid in March. So my wife sits up at night reading the baby name book, thinking of what would be the most appropriate first name for our coming child," he said on National Public Radio. "At the same time, I'm toiling over what would be the best last name to pick for our coming young one." [tinyurl.com/madoff02]

Actually, Ari Madoff is related to a Bernard Madoff – his 94-year-old zaide who lives in a Windsor, Ont., nursing home. So the grandson has elongated his introduction to "Ari no-relation-to-the-Bernard Madoff you're about to ask me about."

Israelis urged to join media war

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Israel's Consul General in Toronto, Amir Gissin, is calling on the expatriate Israeli community to join in the local front in the ongoing war with Hamas.

Gissin said local Israelis should participate in the media and public relations war that is underway in Canada. It's not sufficient to have their hearts and minds linked to events and people in Israel, he said. They must join the local Jewish community in making Israel's case to Canadians.

Amir Gissin

"It's time for members of the Israeli community who support Israel to be more active and get engaged in what the Jewish community is doing, to take a leadership role," he said.

"There is a war we all cannot attend… This a war going on that is becoming more and more important in the media – the war for public opinion. That is where we can be effective, especially since the media is becoming a two-way communication."

Gissin made his pitch at a special information meeting organized by the Association for Soldiers in Israel – Canada (ASI), a support group that "funds social, spiritual and recreational programs and facilities to ease the burden faced by young soldiers."

He expanded on his remarks in an interview with The CJN.

Gissin, who was instrumental in launching a program to re-brand Israel, said contemporary media has become a two-way street, in which consumers "talk back and make their voice heard." He urged Israelis to write letters to the editor about reportage from Gaza and to respond on Internet comment pages when they want to correct the record.

"It was a call for them to use the Internet and mailing lists, and talk to friends and get them involved, too," he said. "We are not in a position to tell people what to say or what to do. We are in a position of encouragement."

Gissin said the Canadian media has, by and large, been fair in its treatment of the current conflict. In fact, he continued, the overarching narrative of the conflict has departed from past descriptions of Israel's fights with its enemies. This time, the media recognize that "Israel is fighting Hamas, not the Palestinian population. It also sees clearly that Hamas is acting as the proxy of Iran. People do understand. There is an organ outside the Middle East that is trying to destabilize the immediate arena."

Hamas unilaterally ended a ceasefire and started firing 40, 50 and 80 missiles a day, and despite "pictures that are difficult" from Gaza, Canadians know who is responsible for the violence, he said.

Nir Sela, managing director of ASI Canada, said the information meeting, attended by about 200 people at the Bernard Betel Centre, also served as a fundraiser, with $30,000 raised that night. That money was bundled with funds raised earlier plus other donations in a package of "a few hundred thousand dollars" that was sent to Israel to support soldiers during the Gaza operation.

The money is going to an emergency campaign to provide various types of recreational and respite facilities for soldiers. ASI in Israel operates several large tents near Gaza in which off-duty soldiers can watch TV, surf the Internet, eat a meal, do laundry, mail letters and play games. Soldiers receive food packages twice a week, and ASI provides volunteer drivers who bring soldiers home on leave. The organization also operates other stand-alone facilities across the country as a sort of home away from home for off-duty soldiers.

ASI volunteers assist wounded soldiers in hospital with non-medical needs, such as arranging TVs, phones and Internet service for their rooms. Families visiting wounded soldiers are housed in small motel-like buildings near the hospitals.

The ASI supports "soldiers spiritual needs. We boost their morale," Sela said. "We need to always tell them what they are doing is right."

Downturn postpones new Edmonton JCC

By IRENA KARSHENBAUM
Special to The CJN

EDMONTON — Plans to build a new Jewish community centre in the Alberta capital have been postponed after collapsing real estate values derailed the local federation's intention to sell the current JCC to finance the initiative.

The community of about 5,200 had hoped to build the new JCC on land available next to Edmonton's Talmud Torah elementary school, and the project also received a personal $11-million guarantee from Edmonton philanthropist Irv Kipnes, as well as his commitment to volunteer to work on the project.

The decision to sell the old JCC and use the proceeds to build the new one in another location passed by a 163-69 vote in August 2007.

Clyde Hurtig

"We're quite lucky that we didn't spend a lot of money to this point," said Clyde Hurtig, president of the Jewish Federation of Edmonton. But he added that a lot of volunteer hours and energy have already gone into the project, and the community invested considerable resources on a rezoning application with the city to get ready to sell the current JCC's land. That process took eight months, as there was a large backlog of development applications at the time due to the city's then-building boom.

Rezoned lots on the old JCC site were put up for sale last summer, and the advertising was ready to be printed when suddenly, Hurtig said, "The market had gone soft, and then practically overnight in September the market fell apart. In the meantime the cost of construction soared, and we're unable to raise the money."

Edmonton currently has many construction projects that are in the process of being built, so labour and material costs are still high, while on the flip side, the housing market has collapsed.

Hurtig said that his executive decided not to do a capital fundraising campaign because "we felt the community wouldn't support a general campaign for a building."

Fortunately, the JCC had not been demolished, except for a few old tennis courts that were no longer being used, and no sale agreements had been reached, Hurtig said.

The community also ran into other problems. The JCC property, which overlooks the Edmonton River Valley, lost about one-third of its value during the rezoning process when some of the land was identified as being at risk of falling into the river.

"The rezoning of the land resulted in a reduced number of saleable lots on the site, as city planners required a significant 'set back' from the ravine… This reduced the original projected revenue," Hurtig said in a letter to the community posted on the federation's website.

"However, acting in good faith I believed, and still believe that the project could have been a success if the housing market had not collapsed," Hurtig added

A further difficulty came when the architectural plans for the new 35,000-square-foot facility – which was to contain a daycare, a kosher restaurant, fitness facilities, a seniors residence and community offices – came in and the budget figures were almost double of what was originally anticipated.

"All of this is very frustrating and very disappointing. I've spent hundreds of hours working on this," Hurtig said. "We've got the painting hanging at the JCC of what the development would look like. The problem is no one is coming forward to make an offer on the land."

In the meantime, the community isn't giving up.

"We're still looking at doing something," Hurtig said. "Depending on how things go, maybe we'll be able to renovate the current facility, or build a new facility."

He added: "All of this is still being worked on. Unfortunately, it can't be done overnight. All of this is done by volunteers and the JCC staff."

Hurtig said he's hopeful that "maybe things will turn around."

According to CIDA, the other $1 million is being earmarked for the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC), which CIDA said "has an established presence in the region" that helps with food and water distribution as well as sanitation services.

CIDA added that none of the funding will go to Hamas, which Ottawa considers a terrorist organization, but that it stood ready to inject more financial support, if necessary, as the humanitarian situation in Gaza develops.

Calls by The CJN to the agency were not returned by deadline.

"The conditions in Gaza are very concerning," Cannon said. "Canada urges all efforts to allow safe and unhindered access to humanitarian assistance."

Cannon also commended Israel's Jan. 6 decision to "facilitate the delivery of humanitarian assistance through a temporary ceasefire" in which the Israel Defence Forces started allowing a daily three-hour window for relief workers to move aid into Gaza.

Hamas has used these pockets of calm to fire more rockets at Israel.

Speaking to reporters on Parliament Hill after the announcement last week, Cannon answered questions about Canada's position on "the proportionality" of Israel's response to Hamas' years of rocket attacks on the Jewish state's southern cities, saying that Israel "is allowed to defend itself and… it defended itself. While recognizing that, and asking Hamas to cease its rocket attacks, we need an immediate ceasefire that is going to be durable and have two states living side by side, in peace, living democratically."

Moshe Ronen, chair of the Canada-Israel Committee, told The CJN his organization welcomed the government's efforts on behalf of the Palestinian people as part of an international endeavour to address humanitarian needs.

"That said, the [committee] has cautioned the government that it must ensure that the assistance is not hijacked by Hamas or diverted to support Hamas operatives at the expense of the civilian population for whom it was intended," Ronen said.

"As always, Canadian aid must be accompanied by a protocol that ensures transparency and accountability so that Canada can be certain the assistance reached the intended population."

Protesters enter Montreal consulate

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — About 15 anti-Israel protesters made their way up to the sixth-floor offices of the Israeli consulate in the Westmount Square office tower in Montreal the morning of Jan. 8, a day after a similar incident occurred in Toronto.

The Montreal women held a noisy demonstration in the hallway until police arrived about an hour later and asked them to leave, consulate spokesperson Peter Subissati said.

He said they didn't appear to try to enter the heavily secured consulate. They left without resistance when the police told them to go and continued their demonstration outside Westmount Square.

No damage was done and there were no arrests.

Subissati said the protesters, the majority of whom appeared to him to be women, arrived before 9 a.m. There were only four staff in the consulate at the time. No one from the consulate engaged with them verbally, he said.

The protesters carried placards and megaphones and unfurled a large banner with the name of the incident's organizer, Tadamon (solidarity in Arabic). The group was the main organizer of the large Jan. 4 rally in Montreal and other demonstrations against Israel's actions in Gaza.

Tadamon said its goal was to serve the consulate with an "eviction notice" for "war crimes under the fourth Geneva convention" in Gaza.

Subissati said the incident "came as a surprise," even though a similar event had occurred in Toronto the day before, when eight Jewish women, including prominent activist Judy Rebick, were arrested and later released after they entered the Israeli consulate and began protesting Israel's actions in Gaza.

"תבואי אלי לפגישה מחר, כאילו את באה לראיון עבודה." יעצת לי סאלי, יועצת התעסוקה הדינמית שלי, אותה אתם כבר מכירים מהטורים הקודמים. "אנחנו צריכות להכין אותך לראיון. לראות אם את עוברת מסך." מוסיפה, כדי שהשחקנית שבי תתלהב (אין מה לומר, היא כבר הצליחה להבין טיפה מי אני).

"מה לובשים לראיון, כדי להתקבל לעבודה?" אני שואלת את מאיר בבית. מאיר מכין חביתות, ולא עונה. "נו?" אני שואלת שוב. "אם הייתי יודע איך עוברים ראיון עבודה, הייתי עובד היום, לא?!" הוא עונה בחמיצות. אני בורחת לחדר השינה.

אני מנזרת כמה בגדים על המיטה, ושמחה לגלות שהם מאפיינים אותי: הם צבעוניים, בוהמיינים וסמרטוטיים למדי, כיאה לאומנית שאני.

כשאני מסיימת לספר לה על עצמי, אנחנו מזמינות סנדוויצ'ים לארוחת צהריים. בתום הארוחה, ממוירסת, אני מקשיבה להערות שלה.

"ישנם דברים שאת לא מוכרחה לדווח עליהם." היא פותחת. "לדוגמה, הסיטואציה ההיא, בה החלטת להמריד את כל עובדי העיתון בו כתבת לשביתה, בגלל שהעורכת הלשונית אמרה לך במעלית שהתפטרת שלך לא הצליחה. או אפילו המקרה המצער בו דחפת את השחקנית הראשית מכל המדרגות ושברת לה את היד, כדי שהיא תהיה אותנטית יותר בתפקיד הטרגי המתבקש."

אני מקשיבה, מהורהרת.

"בקיצור," קמה סאלי ממקומה, "אל תהיי שתוללנית וססגונית. את הרי שחקנית, נכון? תשחקי תפקיד. תכנסי לנעליים של דמות סגורה, אפרורית, שקטה, נימוסית, לא פטפטנית (מבט מתרה) אדיבה, וקנדית."

אנחנו נפרדות בלחיצת יד רפה. "והעיקר," קוראת אחרי סאלי בעליצות, "חיוך על הפנים! תהיי אופטימית!"

אני מתאמנת על להיות אפרורית מספר ימים, עד שאני מחמנת לראיון עבודה (עזרת למוכרת בחנות גרביים, אם זה כל כך מעניין אתכם).

בתום הראיון, ג'ניפר מתבוננת בי ממרום שנותיה וקומתה (סיונית מתוקה וקומפקטית בת 22), ומחייכה לי בצער שהמשרה לא מתאימה לי.

"אולי תנסי לעבוד במעבדה, או במחסן ספרותי! העיקר לא עם לקוחות ישירים." היא מציעה לי בצער, כשהיא מלווה אותי החוצה. "אין לך כנראה כישורים חברותיים. את משוגעת מדי, מופנמת."

אני מהנהנת בכובד ראש, ונפרדת ממנה.

אני אפילו לא מספרת למאיר שלא התקבלתי. כזו אני. טיפוס סגור...

Funding problems arise in JNF-Manitoba project

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Despite an apparent 2006 pledge to do so, the Jewish National Fund (JNF) has yet to to raise substantial funds for a research partnership formed that year between it and the province of Manitoba.

The province committed $1 million, to be paid over a three-year period starting in 2006, to the partnership with the Israeli environmental organization. So far, $700,000 of that money has been invested with the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba in an endowment fund.

The partnership will fund research in agriculture and water conservation and usage, part of growing co-operation between JNF and the province in these areas.

The program for JNF Prairie region's JNF Negev Gala Concert, honouring Premier Gary Doer, stated: "The province recently announced a commitment of $1 million in support of the fund, with the JNF targeting to match that amount through fundraising."

However, in the 2006 memo of understanding between the JNF and the province, the JNF doesn't make any commitment to raise a specific amount of money for the partnership endowment fund.

Erez Rotem, current JNF director for the prairie region, told The CJN that the "JNF encourages and will encourage its supporters to donate to the partnership endowment fund." However, he acknowledged that there hasn't been any specific fundraising drive for for the partnership endowment, and minimal money has been raised so far.

In a telephone interview, Rami Kleinmann, the former national director of the JNF, said that the statement in the 2006 gala concert program was made in good faith in "an advertisement brochure," in which the JNF gave an "ideal amount" it would have liked to have been able to raise.

Kleinmann said that, unfortunately, after the concert was held in June 2006, the Second Lebanon War broke out the next month.

The war caught everyone off guard and changed the focus of JNF's fundraising, he said, because the organization had to raise "emergency funds" to assist the Israeli home front.

"When the war broke out, the [fundraising] focus changed and the 2006-2007 campaign was directed toward re-foresting the north of Israel, which had been badly damaged by the war," Kleinmann said.

For most of 2008, after Kleinmann left the JNF, there was no shaliach in the Winnipeg office until Rotem arrived this past August.

Kleinmann, who is now executive director of Canadian Friends of Hebrew University, said that the relationship with the province is "precious" and fundraising requires "a lot of patience."

In 2007, the JNF paid for the costs of taking a First Nations delegation from Grand Rapids, Man., to Israel to look into advancing a greenhouse project on a reserve and other initiatives using Israeli technology.

Kleinmann added that he believes the JNF will be able to raise money for the partnership endowment fund once there is "a tangible project," around which to build a fundraising campaign.

He said fundraising would be more successful once the community can see the kinds of research projects the endowment fund can support.

Both Kleinmann and Rotem noted that in the upcoming year, the JNF will be raising money for the Manitoba-Israel Water Symposium, slated to take place later this year in Israel. The first such symposium took place in Winnipeg this past August.

Kleinmann added that once there have been two water symposiums, which give potential donors an idea of the kind of scientific collaboration that the partnership endowment fund can support, then "it will be possible [for the JNF] to campaign to raise funds for this fund."

Immediately after filming ended for the Ryerson short film about the Holocaust, So Soon Forgotten, the extras on the set made a point of thanking writer and director Zack Bernbaum for the experience.

The fourth-year film student was told how much being a part of this re-creation of history meant to them and how they would go home and do more research into this time period. Getting reactions like that meant a great deal to Bernbaum.

"It seems like you're doing something right," he said.

Bernbaum's 15-minute short film was inspired by the true story of Otto Teibeth, a Polish Jew who disguised himself as an SS officer in an attempt to stop a trainful of Hungarian Jews from being deported to Auschwitz. Bernbaum's story focuses on one group out of the 400,000 that were deported.

"The smaller stories are not always brought to the forefront," Bernbaum says.

This is Bernbaum's thesis project at Ryerson, which is set to be completed this month, but his plans for the film extend far beyond the classroom.

Along with fellow student and producer of the film, Josh Clavir, Bernbaum plans to submit the movie to all the major film festivals, including Cannes, Venice, Berlin, Munich and the Toronto international film festivals.

"It's basically a calling card for what we can do at this stage. It shows what we can maybe do better... but maybe not bigger," he says, laughing.

Armed with more than $30,000 in budget, Bernbaum is going big with this project. As filming was done with a 35-millimetre camera, the movie will have a high-quality finish.

The sets include a built-to-scale replica of a section of Auschwitz, which Bernbaum visited last spring and took pictures of with his potential film set in mind.

The use of a 1940s South Simcoe Railway steam engine train, as well as costumes flown in from Vancouver and a 10-piece string orchestra for the scoring of the film, all gives the movie high production values.

Bernbaum feels extremely lucky to have garnered such a quick and enthusiastic response when he pitched the project to a number of sponsors last February.

Zack Bernbaum, right, said he wanted to create a film that would bring smaller Holocaust stories to the forefront.

The funding has enabled Bernbaum to bring to life those scenes that he envisioned when he first began writing the script. He had his work translated into German by a friend who is a screenwriting student at the Filmakademie in Baden-Württemberg.

"I think it was a good choice to have it in German," Bernbaum says. "It really lends itself to authenticity and makes it stand out [from other films]."

The fact that the seven-day shoot ran smoothly sets it apart from other student productions, as well.

"We never hit the student 18-hour day," Bernbaum says. "We got it done in a realistic time frame that didn't push the crew to mutiny and not having fun."

But producing the film was not without its challenges.

"There were some great obstacles, too," says Clavir. "We were working with 85 extras."

One of their main jobs was to rally the extras and keep them organized, which was often difficult with little children involved.

Some of the extras included Bernbaum and Clavir's own family members and friends. Bernbaum's father, Ron; his mother, Renee; and his sister, Rebecca, were there, as well as Clavir's father, Barry. All were struck by the importance of the story of Teibeth, which Bernbaum came across when researching the time period.

This is not the first film in which Bernbaum has documented the Holocaust. In his second year of university, he made a documentary about the experiences of his grandmother, who survived the labour camp Grünberg and the ensuing death march.

The documentary, titled Helen, premièred at the Chicago International Reel Shorts Festival.

Recreating Teibeth's story in So Soon Forgotten struck a chord with everyone on set.

"The emotions really came through even in the background shots because people were experiencing a part of what if would have been like," Bernbaum said.

"It was interesting to see my family kind of relive that event," he says.

Filming the movie was an odd experience, because half his mind was devoted to being in the moment and watching the story unfold and the other half was turned to actually directing the movie, he says.

There is one particular shot that will always stay with Bernbaum and Clavir. It's a scene in which a group has escaped from the train on which they would have been deported and are running through a wheat field.

The camera starts filming low to the ground and slowly pulls up to a great height, revealing the vast expanse of the field and the people running for freedom.

"It's very poetic and something I was really going for in style," Bernbaum said.

"When I wrote the script and visualized it, this is how I was wanting it to look."

Bernbaum said he used as many as 85 extras, some of whom are shown being loaded into a train car, for his film.

Canadian teens head to DC for USY convention

Compiled by CJN Staff

More than 1,100 teenage members and advisers of United Synagogue Youth gathered at the Marriott Wardman Park Hotel in Washington, D.C., late last month for the 58th annual USY International Convention.

USY is the high school affiliate of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism.

Among the attendees were 26 eastern Canadian region USYer's from Hamilton, Montreal, Ottawa and Toronto. During the convention, which took place Dec. 21 to 25, participants explored the educational theme of Israel at 60 in workshops, informal classes and group activities.

One of the convention's speakers was Cory Schneider, president of the Women's League for Conservative Judaism, who received the USY Alumni Award.

Eric Lynn, the top staffer on Jewish affairs for U.S. president-elect Barack Obama's campaign, addressed the teens about the importance of Israel advocacy.

Mazi Melesa, of the North American Conference on Ethiopian Jewry, also addressed the convention, as part of the induction ceremony for USY's Abraham Joshua Heschel Honor Society.

"Throughout the past 58 years, USY has provided a positive forum for social, educational and religious programming for thousands of teens," said Jules Gutin, USY director. "The annual USY International Convention allows nearly 1,000 teenagers at once to share experiences and learn from each other about both the current events of today as well as the events that have shaped the Jewish people.

"Having the educational theme focus on Israel allowed our teenagers to explore a topic which is relevant and evolving, yet was explored in Judaic texts centuries ago."

Participants spent time on Tuesday, Dec. 23, volunteering with Bears from Bergenfield, a New Jersey-based organization that collects new and gently used stuffed animals and sends them to Israel to comfort children affected by terror.

Convention director Karen Stein said that "part of our objective is to teach the Jewish values of gemilut chasadim, performing acts of loving-kindness for others, and tikkun olam, literally, repairing the world.

"It is also nice to make a positive impact on the community while teaching our youth the importance of helping others, regardless of their faith or race," she added.

In addition to activities related to the convention theme of Israel at 60, there were leadership workshops and committee meetings dealing with political action programming, chapter and regional communications and social action programming.

Convention delegates elected officers to the 2009 USY International executive board. David Helfand of Leawood, Kan., was elected to the office of president, succeeding Adam Berman of Bexley, Ohio. Maxwell Marmer, of Shaar Shalom Synagogue in Thornhill, Ont., was elected to serve as the international communication vice-president.

Marmer's region, Eastern Canadian Region United Synagogue Youth, won an award for raising the most money per capita for SATO (Social Action/Tikkun Olam).

"It's hard to name just one or two highlights," said Stein. "The whole convention has such a positive energy that comes from all the experiences, ideas and activities.

"The impact can last for months, even after the convention is over. When USYers go back to their regions and chapters, they give a real boost to the level of programming and involvement in USY."

In keeping with its commitment to outreach, USY holds the convention in a different city each year. In December 2009, the convention will be in Chicago.

Eastern Canadian Region USYers join over 1,000 teens in Washington for annual international convention.

CODE RED for Israel's first-aid services

With missiles from Gaza striking further then ever into Israel, Magen David Adom Israel is on duty 24/7 providing the best pre-hospital care in the world to the citizens of southern Israel.

The Jerusalem Post reported on Jan. 7, 2009 that 40 rockets from Gaza were fired on southern Israel on just one day, Jan. 6, and that Magen David Adom paramedics raced to 37 of the 40 rocket impact scenes. About 15% of the ambulances and scooters used by those paramedics were purchased by Canadian donors.

Help us support the 4000 selfless volunteer first aid responders, who together with drivers and paramedics in 400 ambulances and on medical scooters are saving the lives of innocent Israeli civilians.

Montreal rally stresses morality of Israel's cause

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Cries in Arabic for the deaths of Jews heard during the Jan. 4 anti-Israel demonstration through the streets of downtown Montreal show what the conflict between Israel and Hamas is truly about, Rabbi Reuven Poupko told the community rally in support of Israel in Montreal last week.

"We know what this means, we've heard it before. It's not about Israel or its policies, it's about the Jewish people. Our very existence is a provocation to Hamas and its supporters."

Without being specific, Rabbi Poupko expressed a sense of betrayal over human rights defenders who have found common cause with Hamas and denounce "the only bastion" in the Middle East of the principles they claim to cherish.

A standing-room only audience of about 1,000 people attended the rally, held at Rabbi Poupko's Congregation Beth Israel Beth Aaron. The crowd frequently waved Canadian, Quebec and Israeli flags and broke into spontaneous singing of Hebrew songs and chants of "Am Yisrael chai."

They watched a live feed from the Negev city of Be'er Sheva, which is now within range of the Hamas missiles.

Israeli Consul General Yoram Elron received a standing ovation after declaring that "enough is enough" of Hamas' shelling of southern Israel thousands of times over the past eight years.

"Critics speak of a lack of proportionality in Israel's response, but the question is which other nation would show so much restraint?"

He vowed that Israel will continue to fight until its citizens can live in peace.

Rabbi Poupko delivered a fiery address, his voice breaking at times. He castigated Hamas for using children, women and the elderly as "human shields" against Israeli fire. The Israel Defence Forces do all they can to avoid civilian casualties, yet the army continues to be "libelled" by CNN, the BBC and other media, he said.

"Too many Israelis are in their graves today because we were more concerned about their kids than they are," he said.

"Peace will come the day Palestinian leaders care about their own children as much as we do about them," he charged, dismissing the "crocodile tears" over Palestinian civilian deaths as cynical. He also deplored what he views as the silence from the world when "Muslims kill Muslims" in Sudan, Somalia and Iraq, and Russia killed "tens of thousands" of Muslims in Chechnya.

"The explanation is that the loss of Muslim life will only be protested when they can point an accusatory finger at Israel."

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz, who co-chairs the Canada-Israel Committee's Canadian Rabbinic Caucus with Rabbi Poupko, also charged that Israel is being libelled. Charges that its army disregards Palestinian civilian lives is "the modern-day equivalent of the blood libel," he said.

He pledged the community's unwavering support. "Israel is our home, our heart, our hope, and we will be there for Israel no matter what."

Mount Royal Liberal MP Irwin Cotler sent a message from Jerusalem accusing Hamas of war crimes and a "genocidal objective in the deliberate targeting" of Israeli civilians. He said using Palestinian civilians as "human shields" when it launches missiles at Israel also constitutes a war crime. Fellow Liberal, Marlene Jennings, MP for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce-Lachine and deputy house leader, attended the rally.

The New Democratic Party (NDP) was criticized by Federation CJA president Marc Gold for its position on the conflict between Israel and Hamas, and he suggested a split exists within the party.

"We do have friends in the NDP and they are as sick at heart as we are with the leadership of that party," Gold said.

In contrast, Gold said the Harper government has remained steadfast in its support of Israel in this current crisis, and the Liberals and even the Bloc Québécois have shown an understanding of Israel's actions. Gold urged community members to write to supportive politicians to thank them. He said the Quebec media, overall, have also been more understanding of Israel in this conflict than in the past and should receive due praise.

Winnipeggers back Israel

By RHONDA SPIVAK

WINNIPEG — Some 550 people attended a "Stand with Israel" rally Jan. 8 at Winnipeg's Asper Community Campus, and they were joined by a number of federal and provincial cabinet ministers and politicians.

"[Ever since the creation of the state], the people of Israel have been forced to defend themselves on a daily basis," said provincial NDP Justice Minister David Chomiak.

"The enemy and the fear are [Hamas] terrorists who know no limits," he added.

Joy Smith, the Conservative MP for Kildonan-St. Paul, who flew in from Ottawa for the event, noted that Hamas is listed as a terror group under federal law

"Canada maintains that Hamas rocket attacks are the cause of this crisis," she said.

"The tragic truth is that civilian deaths will continue until Hamas abandons the policy of terror or until someone takes away its ability to wage war against the civilian population," Jonathan Kroft, president of the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg, told the audience.

Anita Neville, Liberal MP for Winnipeg South Centre, told the rally: "In 2005, Israel unilaterally withdrew every Israeli soldier and 8,000 civilians from the Gaza Strip. The current situation is, therefore, not about occupation… It is about Hamas' pursuit of their declared aim to destroy Israel."

She added: "Despite the graphic images in the media, we know that Israel's intent is to target terrorists and spare civilians."

Neville quoted Liberal leader Michael Ignatieff, who said Jan. 8, "Hamas is to blame for organizing, instigating these rocket attacks, and then for sheltering among civilian populations. And Israel is justified in continuing military operations."

She also noted that Ignatieff said: "The rocket and mortar attacks must end and a permanent ceasefire should result."

Federal Treasury Board President Vic Toews received a standing ovation when he said: "Defence of Israel is not a political choice for our government, it is a moral imperative.

"We have also been clear that we believe Israel has a clear right to defend itself against the continued rocket attacks by Palestinian militant groups which have deliberately targeted civilians," he said. "Israel has the clear legal and moral right to defend its people," he added.

"Israeli and Palestinian leaders must remain committed to finding a comprehensive peace settlement. We remain supportive of the Middle East peace process… We offer our complete support to the parties in reaching their goal of a comprehensive two-state solution," Toews said.

He also noted that Canada has "called for the international community to come together to address the deteriorating humanitarian situation [in Gaza]."

Manitoba's minister of water stewardship, Christine Melnick, was also at the rally.

By SHIRIN EZEKIEL
Special to The CJN

Guest Voice

As Shabbat began in Jerusalem, our group headed to the Kotel.

We saw the rooftops of the Old City from the path we walked on, and chanukiyot lit the way.

As part of Hillel of Greater Toronto's New Media Initiative, 16 students travelled to Israel to take part in a program to develop their skills in communication technology.

When we approached the Kotel, we covered the eyes of Simon, the only participant in the program who had never been to Jerusalem.

When he finally opened his eyes at one of the lookout points we stopped at, he broke out in tears of both awe and excitement. The group then made its way to the Kotel and created a Carlebach minyan, to which more than 70 people joined and danced.

Shabbat began as the perfect ending for an intensive week of workshops in Tel Aviv and Jerusalem.

The group awoke well rested and ready to hear from Khaled Abu Tomeh, the Palestinian affairs correspondent for the Jerusalem Post.

He broke the news of the operation in the Gaza Strip that had begun a few hours earlier on Dec. 27. Our group's participants were in a state of shock about how quickly things can change in Israel.

The conversation with Tomeh revolved around how the operation would proceed and how he foresees the future of the conflict.

Tomeh's honesty left us in deep thought about the complexity of the situation, for which he could see no easy solution, even with his vast expertise in reporting from both sides.

Then things began changing rapidly around us. Israelis we knew were called up for army reserve duty, including our tour guide.

Security in Jerusalem was heightened and highly visible, with most of the Arab market in the Old City of Jerusalem closed.

Although daily life continued as usual, the conversations we heard revolved around the situation in Gaza.

In Jerusalem, Jews and Arabs we spoke to were all concerned about the chain of events that had led to the Gaza operation.

When our group ventured north, it felt like a world apart.

We had the opportunity to discuss the situation with Israeli citizens of all faiths – Christians, Muslims, Druze – and were surprised that they were all in favour of ensuring the safety of the inhabitants of Israel.

While in the north, our group came face to face with the power of new media, when one little BlackBerry brought the most current news to our group, including a fascinating article on how new media is tackling the challenge of covering the Gaza operation.

Social networking tools such as blogs, Facebook and Twitter are new ways to distribute information in a variety of media to broader audiences.

The events in Israel made our mission even more clear, as we saw how new media made an immediate impact on our lives.

The most important part of experiencing Israel is to try to bring home the feelings on the ground.

They motivate us to do more, and to bring back to campus the sense of peace, openness and dialogue that exists there.

If in such serious times, dialogue and optimism can be found in Israel, then there is a way we can do the same in Canada.

Diplomats work towards ceasefire

By LESLIE SUSSER
JTA

JERUSALEM — As the war in Gaza continues, with Israeli ground troops poised to intensify their actions against Hamas militants, weapons' stores and rocket-launching sites, diplomatic efforts to end the fighting have gathered pace.

Israeli analysts said that although the Hamas military infrastructure has been dealt a devastating blow, the organization's fighting force remains largely intact. One of the goals of the Israeli ground operation is to hit the militia's fighters hard, which could entail tough house-to-house combat.

Analysis

The militiamen have taken up positions in built-up areas in densely populated towns and refugee camps, and confronting them in those conditions could be very risky for Israeli soldiers and Palestinian civilians.

The possibility of serious escalation, however, brought French President Nicolas Sarkozy and three European foreign ministers to Jerusalem to try to bring the fighting in Gaza to an end. Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni indicated Israel's readiness to end the war, but only if its exit demands were met.

The Israeli dilemma is how to create conditions that guarantee security for southern Israel without granting Hamas a measure of international legitimacy. The Israelis have been warning against a scenario in which a defeated Hamas makes enormous political gains merely by being treated by the international community as a full partner in ceasefire negotiations.

This, they argue, is totally unacceptable: Hamas gained power through a violent coup in June 2007 and is dedicated to Israel's destruction. The Israelis are therefore seeking a new international "arrangement" that would address all their security concerns, as well as the issue of border crossings to and from Gaza, without Hamas having any say in the negotiating process.

In their contacts with the Americans and Europeans, Israeli leaders have outlined three key elements to be included in the new arrangements: a credible ceasefire to end rocket fire on Israeli civilians, an internationally supervised mechanism to prevent Hamas rearming, and joint European Union, Egyptian and Palestinian Authority supervision at border crossing points.

To deter Hamas from firing more rockets after a ceasefire is achieved, Israel wants to have its right to retaliate written into the ceasefire terms.

Israel's biggest headache is the possibility of Hamas rebuilding and enhancing its rocket-firing capabilities by smuggling new and longer-range weapons across the border with Egypt.

Israel is demanding that the new arrangements include collapsing all the smuggling tunnels under the Philadelphi route along the Gaza-Egypt border; erecting a physical barrier on the Egyptian side of the border that would make smuggling virtually impossible; deploying an international force in the buffer zone between Egypt and Gaza; and securing a commitment from Egypt to stop the flow of arms into Sinai, from where they find their way to the Gaza border.

Hamas' main demand has been that Israel allow the opening of all crossing points in and out of Gaza. Israel says it is prepared to do so, on the basis of a 2005 agreement under which the crossings would be supervised jointly by Israel, the Palestinian Authority (not Hamas), Egypt and the European Union. This is also the Egyptian position with regard to the Rafah crossing point from Gaza into Egypt.

One of the difficulties with the uncompromising Israeli position against talking to Hamas is that it complicates chances for the return of captured Israeli soldier Gilad Shalit. Israeli leaders say they would like to see Shalit return as part of the overall ceasefire arrangement, but it is hard to see how this could be accomplished without a prisoner exchange deal with Hamas.

The Americans and Europeans are split in their approach to the Israeli ceasefire terms. The Americans say a ceasefire should be put in place only when conditions exist for it to be stable and lasting. The Europeans, however, say a ceasefire should go into effect immediately. They say these aims could be secured more easily once a ceasefire is in place.

Egyptians have strong regional and domestic reasons for their opposition to Hamas. They see Iran as their most dangerous regional foe, and Gaza controlled by Hamas as a forward Iranian base on their doorstep. They also fear the ideological connection between Hamas and the seditious opposition Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt. And they realize that the border tunnels could support terror and violence in the opposite direction – from Gaza into Egypt.

Israel and Egypt thus have a common interest in weakening Hamas and moderating Iranian influence in Gaza.

Gaza rockets continue during humanitarian lull

JTA

JERUSALEM — Two houses in southern Israel were hit by Hamas rockets during a voluntary Israeli humanitarian ceasefire.

Israel stopped fighting for three hours Monday, as it has daily for the last week, in order to allow Palestinian civilians to restock or change locations and to allow aid agencies to distribute goods during the 17th day of Operation Cast Lead. But Hamas continued to fire rockets at Israel during the lull, scoring direct hits on homes in Ashkelon and Sderot. No one was injured, though several people went into shock and the homes were badly damaged.

One rocket landed very close to an Ashkelon high school where students had returned and were holding classes in bomb shelters. Attendance at the school, however, was very low.

At least 16 rockets have hit southern Israel since Monday morning. According to reports, the number of rocket and mortar strikes on southern Israel has significantly decreased since the start of the operation.

Reserve soldiers have been sent into Gaza, an indication that the operation may be widening.

Overnight, the air force hit four weapons storehouses located in the homes of Hamas operatives, two tunnels dug under the homes of Hamas operatives and a smuggling tunnel on Gaza's border with Egypt, as well as one rocket launching position. Israel Defence Forces ground troops clashed with armed Hamas gunmen in the northern Gaza Strip.

Pro-Israel rallies held around world

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspapers Ltd

More than 10,000 people gathered on 42nd Street in New York, outside the Israeli consulate, to show their support for the Gaza offensive.

Meanwhile, thousands more pro-Israel demonstrators rallied across Europe, including Prague, Dublin, Antwerp, Berlin, London and Manchester.

The demonstrations were held amid a series of pro-Palestinian protests in cities throughout Europe and Muslim states, many of which have turned violent and included anti-Semitic terms to condemn the operation.

In New York, demonstrators donned red hats as a symbol of Israel's "Colour Red" rocket alert, chanting "Am Yisrael Chai" – the people of Israel live — as politicians took to the stage to voice their support of the offensive.

British organizers estimated that as many as 20,000 people participated in the London demonstration, which took place in Trafalgar Square. A parallel rally was held in Manchester's Albert Square.

"It was important for Anglo-Jewry to show support and solidarity with Israel. I felt proud to be Jewish," said Theo Julius, a participant at the London demonstration.

Demonstrators waved placards reading "End Hamas Terror – Peace for the People of Israel and Gaza."

Meanwhile, in a letter published in Britain's Observer newspaper on Sunday, 11 leading BritishJ e w s urged Israel to end its Gaza campaign and negotiate a settlement for security reasons.

"We are concerned that rather than bringing security to Israel, a continued military offensive could strengthen extremists, destabilize the region and exacerbate tensions inside Israel with its one million Arab citizens," the letter said.

Among the signatories were Baroness Julia Neuberger, former Local Government Association chairman Sir Jeremy Beecham and Tony Bayfield, the head of the Movement for Reform Judaism.

They said the rocket attacks by Hamas and other militant Palestinian groups were "war crimes against Israel" and that they supported Israel's right in putting a stop to the rocket attacks. But it questioned the military actions and called for a stop.

"However, we believe that now only negotiations can secure long-term security for Israel and the region," it said.

In Dublin, supporters gathered waving Israeli flags and singing psalms in lashing rain, separated by a police barricade from a rival pro-Palestinian rally.

"Israel is the only democracy in the Middle East and has a right to defend itself," said Annette Horseman, 43, from Dublin.

Gilad Handler, 25, an Israeli high-tech worker living in Dublin, said the high number of Palestinian civilian casualties was difficult for Israelis.

"We don't want war with Gaza," he said. "But it's enough getting years of rocket barrages on our heads from there."

On Saturday, violent clashes broke out near the Israeli Embassy in London as thousands of people marched to protest the Gaza offensive.

Demonstrators smashed shop windows, and a policeman was knocked unconscious attempting to control the crowd. At a similar rally last week in Holland, a Dutch legislator called for "intifadah" in order to "free Palestine."

The London rallies on Sunday passed without a repeat of the violent scenes from a day earlier.

Meanwhile, thousands of demonstrators, including high-profile actors and politicians, marched peacefully through Madrid demanding increased international action against Israel's offensive, some chanting, "We are all Palestinians."

The Israeli Embassy in the Spanish capital issued a statement asking why demonstrators there had never protested against aggression by Hamas and calling recent anti-Israel rallies "a double standard."

In Italy, where thousands marched in Naples and Genoa to demand an end to violence in Gaza, Defence Minister Ignazio La Russa said he did not oppose protests but called public Muslim prayers by demonstrators a challenge to peace.

On Saturday, thousands of Muslims knelt in prayer before Milan's central train station. A week ago, Muslims held prayers in front of the city centre cathedral, angering right-wing politicians in the overwhelmingly Catholic country.

While Sunday's pro-Palestinian protests were overwhelmingly peaceful, a Reuters photographer in Brussels reported windows had been smashed and a car overturned and set alight in the area where the city's anti-Israel march had ended.

Chicago shuls vandalized

JTA

CHICAGO — At least three Chicago-area synagogues were vandalized following rallies in support of and against Israel.

The synagogues were defaced early last Saturday morning by two vandals who smashed windows and doors with rocks and bricks and sprayed pro-Palestinian graffiti on the buildings. The men were captured on a video surveillance camera at one synagogue and were seen by a caretaker fleeing the scene at a second shul.

Some of the graffiti read "Death to Israel" and "Free Palestine," according to local reports.

Police believe the incidents could be related, and they're currently being investigated as hate crimes by the Chicago Police Department and the FBI Joint Terrorism Task Force, according to the Secure Community Network, which co-ordinates security for North American Jewish institutions. The Chicago Tribune reported that a fourth synagogue, in the suburb of Lincolnwood, was also vandalized.

The vandalism incidents, and an attempt late the previous Friday afternoon by four unknown men in Chicago to enter a Jewish federation building, followed a Jewish communal rally Friday in support of Israel and a pro-Palestinian rally later in the day.

Authors & Poets

The CJN is pleased to announce its

Annual Passover Literary Supplement

We invite our readers to submit unpublished, original works of fiction or poetry that explore Jewish themes. Stories should not exceed 2,000 words.

We must receive your submissions no later than Friday, March 12. E-mail submissions are preferred, but works can also be sent by mail or brought to our office. E-mail: info@cjnews.com. Mail: 1500 Don Mills Rd., Suite 205, Toronto, Ont., M3B 3K4. Submissions will not be returned. Only writers whose work is chosen for publication will be contacted.

CJN Purim Art Contest

It's time again for our annual Purim Art Contest.

Who can enter: Children in grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN's 2009-Purim Poster. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However, they should not be too small nor too large. Please paint or draw bright, bold, colourful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. Please send us your name, address, phone number, age and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, Toronto, Ont., M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 3 p.m. on Tuesday, Feb. 17, 2009. We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen as the "winners." The judges will base their decisions on a number of factors such as: the use of colour, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The chances of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, February 20, 2009.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of March 5, 2009. Have fun and good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec

'We continue to be passionate about not hitting civilians'

"You have people who ask, why are we making the effort? Why can't we be like other air forces like in Iraq and Afghanistan who hit a target no matter what's around it? That's deep in our values. It's not a slogan."

S. recently expounded on the IAF's rules of engagement at a solidarity and information meeting sponsored by the Association for Soldiers in Israel – Canada. Although he's a reservist and no longer on active duty, military regulations require him to be identified only by an initial.

S. started his military career flying Skyhawks, and for the last 20 years, he piloted F-16s. He flew over Gaza, and he was involved in missions over Lebanon, where military targets and civilian dwellings are often indistinguishable.

As an officer in the IAF's Valley Squadron, he saw first hand how the air force attempts to minimize civilian deaths.

Concern for preventing civilian casualties "is almost at the same level of the operational demand of hitting people," he said. "We do more than any air force in the world to hit only those who want to kill us." Pilots can be grounded for failing to hit a designated target.

Hamas operates behind human shields

As an example, S. recalled a mission that took place four or five years ago. The air force received reliable intelligence that a group of senior Hamas leaders was gathering for a meeting in a Gaza apartment building. It was asked to bomb the meeting, but the location of the meeting – inside a four-storey apartment building – prompted a conference of senior military commanders and Ariel Sharon, at the time acting in his capacity as minister of defence.

In the end, it was decided that the attack plane would employ a relatively small 500-pound bomb "to minimize damage to the surrounding buildings," S. said.

The bomb exploded in the building's upper floor and took it out. However, the meeting was being held one floor below and the Hamas officials all escaped. A larger bomb would have taken out the building and perhaps others nearby, S. pointed out.

The mission highlights the difficulties faced by the air force in operating in Gaza. "Hamas does all it can to do all their activities within civilian population," he said. Although the area is densely populated, there are open places they could move to, he said.

A few weeks ago, the Israeli media reported on an incident that again demonstrated Hamas employing human shields. A senior Hamas official received a pre-recorded phone call saying his home was about to be destroyed. Despite the warning, pilots in observation aircraft noted that civilians suddenly were flocking to the building's roof.

That information was relayed to senior commanders, who have the final say in whether to launch an attack. A decision was made to "throw a smaller munitions bomb near the people." With the nearby explosion, the roof was quickly vacated and the mission to destroy the building proceeded, S. said.

He noted that the IAF employs only highly accurate munitions in Gaza – laser-guided or GPS-controlled bombs – to try to control civilian casualties.

Still, the air force faces operational quandaries. What to do when munitions are housed in the basement of a civilian building? One solution: the military has employed leaflet warnings and cellphone messages, telling people in the building to leave before the attack, he said.

S., who is in Toronto for a short visit, said Israelis are fully supportive of current military operation and the pilots who fly operational missions overwhelmingly know they are in the right.

Still, he acknowledges, it pains him to see images of wounded Palestinian children. "It's hard to see that, and I do empathize with the Palestinian mothers. On the other hand, this is total self defence.

"We want to keep it [civilian casualties] under zero, but we know it's impossible the way Hamas fights."

It's a problem the Israeli Air Force faces every day. Sometimes missions are aborted to prevent Palestinian casualties. And that can put Israeli civilians at risk.

"You miss a lot of opportunities and allow people to continue rocket attacks and sometimes suicide attacks," he said.

"There are hundreds and thousands of man hours of very talented people and sophisticated machines doing patrols and alerts to get big successes you rarely hear about in the news... It's hard to believe we are spending so much our talent" on planning pinpoint attacks on terrorists. Instead, that talent and time could have been put to use building the State of Israel, he said.

But, he continued, "it's something we have to do."

"I'm very proud of what we're doing.

"I wish for us that we continue to be passionate about not hitting civilian people. It's sometimes easy to shut yourself off and concentrate on targets being hit. But the way we do it is important. Thinking about the consequences of hitting civilians, that is the only way to win this war."

Israel Briefs

UN to halt aid deliveries

The United Nations said it will stop aid deliveries to the Gaza Strip after a worker was killed. The driver of a UN truck heading to the Erez crossing to pick up an aid shipment was killed Jan. 8 by what the United Nations said were Israeli tank shells. The Israel Defence Forces said that it's investigating the incident. The United Nations said it will halt the aid deliveries until the safety of its staff can be guaranteed.

Ceasefire order ignored

Israel and Hamas ignored last week's UN Security Council call for a ceasefire. The Security Council issued a resolution Jan. 8 calling for an immediate ceasefire and for an end to weapons smuggling into the Gaza Strip. The Israeli cabinet met the next day and decided to ignore the resolution. Hamas was also reportedly ignoring the resolution.

Cairo talks supported

Israeli officials said the end to the war in Gaza would most likely emerge from talks in Cairo and not at the United Nations. The Cairo talks were the likeliest path to a "political solution," the officials told reporters Jan. 8, adding that they did not regard as serious negotiations in New York aimed at arriving at a UN Security Council consensus on ending the Gaza war. Few details about the "Mubarak initiative," named for the Egyptian president, are known, but reports said it proposes an end to attacks from Gaza and an end to the smuggling of weapons into Gaza in exchange for opening commercial crossings into the strip.

East of Berlin delves into the secrets of a father's past

By SHERRY SMITHER
Special to The CJN

Hannah Moscovitch's East of Berlin is a powerful one-act play.

It opens with Rudi, the son of a Nazi war criminal, nervously trying to light his cigarette. Once he composes himself, he shares his story with the audience, revealing the struggles he faces because of his father's horrific past.

Rudi, brilliantly portrayed by Brendan Gall, makes the audience aware of the torment he faces as the son of a Nazi. Through a series of flashbacks, the character recounts the painful life he's led since his childhood friend Hermann, played by Paul Dunn, reveals that Rudi's father was a Nazi doctor at Auschwitz.

Born after the war, Rudi grew up believing his father was a good man who fought faithfully for his country and lost. He never questioned why his family frequently moved from one South American country to another until they settled in Paraguay.

As Rudi poses questions to the audience searching for ways to come to grips with his father's past, Moscovitch's script cleverly gets the audience to think of how we might deal with these very difficult issues.

What should a person do if they find out that someone they love has kept his past a secret? Could the same parent that read you a bedtime story and who gave you an "ordinary" life be capable of atrocities? Should children be responsible for their parents' conduct?

It's not until Rudi meets a young Jewish woman, Sarah (Diana Donnelly), a Holocaust survivor's daughter, that he fully understands the enormity of his father's actions.

Rudi (Brendan Gall) shows Sarah (Diana Donnelly) his father's jacket from the war.

Moscovitch (who also wrote The Russian Play and Essay) and director Alisa Palmer skillfully take you on a 90-minute journey, one that's difficult to deal with at times, but one you won't want to miss. The moving performances by the three cast members are believable and understated, as is the simple yet creative set design, consisting of bookcases with a door leading to Rudi's past.

This production marks the play's return to the Tarragon Theatre's Extra Space. A 2007 production garnered wide critical praise, winning the Dora Mavor Moore Award for outstanding set design (Camellia Koo) and a nomination for outstanding new play(Moscovitch). The current production has the same cast and crew as its 2007 debut.

The up-and-coming playwright was inspired to develop this play while in the 2006-2007 Tarragon Playwright's Unit, after reading two books – Legacy of Silence and Born Guilty – that included a series of interviews with Nazi children conducted by Jews. The play's title refers to the euphemism Germans used for what was happening to Jews, claiming they were being "resettled in the east." During the war, Jews of Berlin coined the term "going east" to mean "going to the death."

The play runs at the Tarragon until Feb. 1. It then plays at the Touchstone Theatre in Vancouver from Feb. 18 to 28, and at the Theatre Network in Edmonton from March 10 to 29.

Tickets for the Toronto production are available at the Tarragon box office, 30 Bridgman Ave., 416-531-1827. Tuesday–Saturday performances at 8 p.m. are $35-45. Saturday and Sunday matinees at 2:30 p.m. are $35 and Friday night rush seats are $15.

Names in the News: Child of a Holocaust survivor and founder of Toronto's Theatre Asylum, theatre director Jennifer H. Capraru witnessed the aftermath of the Rwandan genocide while a script supervisor for the 2007 feature film Shake Hands With the Devil.

Wanting to contribute to the healing process, Capraru recently founded Isoko, a Kigali-based international theatre company with a mandate to promote healing and peace through theatre. (Isoko means "the source" in the Rwandan language of Kinyarwanda.)

"Rwanda is a post-conflict country healing from genocide," Capraru said. "I have found a significant part of my voice as a theatre artist making work around the Holocaust. Now, I am hoping to help Rwanda artists find their voices and share their tough lessons about how this little land continues to be a beacon of successful reconciliation shining in a troubled world." www.isoko-rwanda.org

The Galilee Eskimos is both bitter and sweet

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Jonathan Paz's Israeli film, The Galilee Eskimos, which is scheduled to be screened by the Jewish Film Society on Jan. 18 at 5 p.m. at the Sheppard Grande Cinema, is bittersweet in every respect.

When a kibbutz near the Lebanese border goes bankrupt, only the senior citizens remain behind, forcing them to adapt to a new reality and fight off an army of bailiffs intent on foreclosing them. The situation lends itself to improvisation, and Paz rises to the occasion.

Not knowing that plans are afoot to sell the kibbutz to a crass developer who wants to transform it into a Las Vegas-style resort – complete with casinos and prostitutes – the last remaining residents try to restore it to a modicum of normality. They restart the generator, turn on the water and electricity, tend to the only cow in the shed, organize meals and clean up the premises.

Still, as one woman complains, they have been left to fend for themselves, like dying Eskimos. This is the stuff of tragedy. The young people have fled, leaving the most vulnerable segment of the kibbutz inhabitants in the lurch. No wonder they feel abandoned and forlorn.

In Paz's hands, however, heartbreak morphs into hope. Having inherited immense responsibilities, the elderly kibbutzniks thrive as they reconnect with each other and joyfully, if tentatively, rediscover their youth, vitality and sexuality. In the process, buried secrets are unearthed, old love affairs are reignited and half-forgotten sentimental songs from the 1948 War of Independence are sung with gusto once again.

Oldsters at a northern kibbutz take control of their lives in Jonathan Paz's Israeli film The Galilee Eskimos.

It's a pleasure watching these oldsters take control of their lives.

Of course, they can't stop the march of time. Kibbutzim are being "privatized" left and right. But they do try to reverse the inevitable

The Galilee Eskimos is a heart warming movie distinguished by good acting from an ensemble of seasoned actors, such as Dina Doron and Hugo Yarden, and by snappy dialogue.

Cruise gives precise performance in Valkyrie

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Of the 15 known assassination plots hatched against Adolf Hitler by anti-Nazi resisters in Germany, the most ambitious one was mounted by senior German army officers and dissenting politicians on July 20, 1944.

Had they succeeded, the course of history may well have changed. Alas, the plot failed, and one of the key participants, Col. Claus Schenk Graf von Stauffenberg, was summarily executed by a vengeful Nazi regime.

Bryan Singer's historical thriller, Valkyrie, which is currently playing in Toronto, is based on these events. Singer has made an earnest effort to recreate the plot, which almost succeeded, and Valkyrie is a workmanlike account of it.

The two-hour film, starring Tom Cruise as the heroic Von Stauffenberg, unfolds in three distinct phases.

It opens in 1943 in the bright sunshine of the Tunisian desert, where Von Stauffenberg – an outspoken officer who has qualms about Germany's military strategy in North Africa – is posted.

Von Stauffenberg's command car is strafed by an Allied bombing raid and he is severely injured, losing his right hand, left eye and two fingers on his left hand.

The movie shifts to Germany, where Maj.-Gen. Henning von Tresckow (Kenneth Branagh) tries to assassinate Hitler by placing a bomb inside a wine case aboard Hitler's personal aircraft.

The device fails to detonate, forcing von Tresckow to go back to the drawing board. He recruits Von Stauffenberg, a Catholic from an aristocratic family. Von Stauffenberg joins the German resistance movement because he is appalled by Germany's treatment of civilians, including Jews, in Nazi-occupied areas and wants to save his country from certain defeat.

In this segment, the plotters abort a plan to kill Hitler, because SS chieftain Heinrich Himmler has surprisingly not shown up at a meeting.

Cruise, stiff and correct in an army uniform and a black patch covering one of his eyes, portrays Von Stauffenberg with militaristic precision in a plausible performance. That he and the other actors deliver their lines in American and British-accented English is definitely not off-putting.

The last part of the film turns on the explosion that slightly injured Hitler (David Bamber) in his secluded compound in East Prussia and on Hitler's wrath and payback.

Singer, whose films hum with energy and purpose, elicits fine performances from an accomplished cast that includes Bill Nighy, Terence Stamp, Kevin McNally and Christian Berkel as four of the anti-Nazi dissenters and Carice van Houten as Von Stauffenberg's loyal wife.

Valkyrie stands as a cinematic monument to a plot that would have had incalculable consequences, both on World War II and the Holocaust, had it been successful.

Tom Cruise as Col. Claus Schenk Graf Von Stauffenberg

Zane Zalis is a big believer in the power of the arts to break through barriers. [Rhonda Spivak photo]

New musical composition based on Holocaust survivor testimony

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Composer, pianist and high school teacher Zane Zalis created his newest work, I Believe, with the goal of educating young people about the Holocaust.

Zalis, a Ukrainian Catholic, and members of Prodigy – a student vocal ensemble he founded – performed an excerpt from I Believe in December at a gathering of the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg.

One of the songs from the piece, I Have a Name, which ends with the words, "You can take me down, but you can never take away my name," left many members of the audience visibly moved, and Zalis and Prodigy received a standing ovation.

"The work is made up of 12 different chapters, that when performed sequentially, comprise a cohesive show," said Zalis, who is musical program director at Miles Macdonell Collegiate in Winnipeg.

"I Believe unfolds as a story from the minds of the victims and of the perpetrators," he says. "I have spent the last four years of my life working on this."

Based on survivor testimony and Zalis' research, I Believe recounts the story of the Holocaust and can be used as a general lesson for future peace. A huge work aimed at general audiences, it includes a full chorus, a children's choir, a full orchestra and soloists.

"The music for I Believe can't be categorized and is constantly changing and malleable," says Zalis, who wrote the music first and then the lyrics.

Last summer, Zalis was a guest presenter at a conference put on by the Yad Vashem Holocaust museum in Jerusalem. "It was a very positive presentation. A Holocaust educator from Durban, South Africa [who was at the conference] is interested in potentially bringing the show there. My goal is for symphonies around the world to present the show," he says.

Zalis said the director of the Elgin Symphony in the Chicago area has expressed interest in presenting the work there.

Zalis believes that in order to properly teach the message of the Holocaust, it should be understood not merely as a subject of interest to the Jewish people, but to all of humanity.

"If we are going to maintain remembrance of the Holocaust in the significant proportions it merits and warrants, then it must be taken to a universal arena," he says. "I am a big believer in the power of the arts to break through walls and barriers. Music for me is a transcendent language"

He stressed that the composition is youth friendly. "What is very important is that youths, ages 17 to 20, really like the music. The WSO [Winnipeg Symphony Orchestra] is excited because this work will bring a whole new crowd to the symphony," Zalis says. "It is a serious work that's accessible to teenagers and the most sophisticated listeners."

The idea for I Believe was born when Zalis was asked to get involved in composing a feature piece for a gala concert for the Mauro Centre of Peace and Justice at the University of Manitoba.

"[After reading about genocide and justice], I concluded that the Holocaust was the seminal event representing the deepest depravity of mankind, and simultaneously the most sublime behaviours of mankind [manifested by those heroes who tried to aid and give refuge to the victims]," he says.

"I wrote an overture [titled] I Believe [for the Mauro Centre] and then decided to write a whole show on this theme… In the course of this, I have become good friends with some survivors."

Zalis has received the support of several private sponsors and a grant from the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba.

"My dream is one day to have a performance in Jerusalem with combined Arab and Jewish [performers]. Anything can be done," he says.

The Winnipeg Symphony Orchestra premières I Believe on May 21. Facilitators from Yad Vashem will come to Manitoba for the first time to conduct educational workshops for teachers during the week the work is performed.

"This is all going to be a package so that educators can receive training and then go to hear the show… It is a way for the community to be involved, so that this becomes a town event," Zalis says.

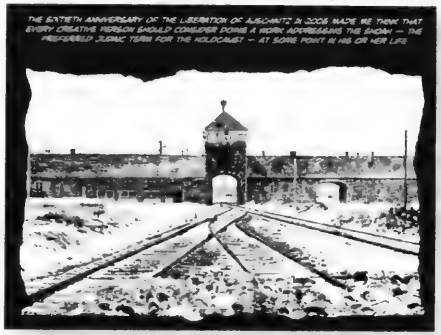
Graphic novels take on anti-Semitism and the Holocaust

By SHLOMO SCHWARTZBERG
Special to The CJN

The continuing rise in popularity of graphic novels has seen all manner of subject matter examined within their pages, including numerous books on Jewish issues and themes.

Among the best-known graphic novels are Israeli novelist Rutu Modan's award-winning Exit Wounds; James Sturm's The Golem's Mighty Swing, a fascinating portrait of a Jewish baseball team touring rural America in the 1920s; and Art Spiegelman's Pulitzer Prize-winning Holocaust parable Maus. And, of course, the many Jewish-flavoured novels of the late Will Eisner, including A Contract with God, Dropsie Avenue and Fagin the Jew, are well-known.



THE SIXTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF THE LIBERATION OF AUSCHWITZ IN 2005 MADE ME THINK THAT EVERY CREATIVE PERSON SHOULD CONSIDER DOING A WORK ADDRESSING THE SHOAH — THE PREFERRED JUDAIC TERM FOR THE HOLOCAUST — AT SOME POINT IN HIS OR HER LIFE.

Graphics as seen in Judenhass, the graphic novel

Two recent graphic novels, Judenhass (Aardvark Vanaheim) and Good-bye Marianne: The Graphic Novel (Tundra Books), tackle anti-Semitism and the Holocaust with differing results.

Judenhass (German for Jew hatred), by Canadian artist and writer Dave Sim – the publisher of the comic book series Cerebus – is nothing less than an ambitious examination of anti-Semitism through the ages, with the Holocaust as the fulcrum linking the past, present and future. In fact, after a cursory observation that many of the American and Canadian Jewish creators of the best-known comic books, Bob Kane (Batman), Joe Shuster and Jerry Siegel (Superman) and Stan Lee (co-creator of Spider-Man), would have suffered the same fate as European Jewry if they had been born in Europe instead of in the safe environs of North America, Judenhass pretty much stays focused on the Holocaust.

Most of Judenhass' 56 pages, which were painstakingly traced by Sim from photocopies of original photographs, showcase in graphic detail the corpses and barely alive survivors of Auschwitz, with accompanying captions detailing anti-Semitic quotes from famous people, such as H.G. Wells, Martin Luther and Voltaire, and facts illuminating the repressive measures and violent actions perpetrated against Jews over the centuries. It's dispiriting and truthful reading, though including comments attributed to writer and satirist Mark Twain, regarding Jews incurring the wrath of the world because of their success as moneylenders, is unfair. Twain is better known for a powerful essay praising the Jews for making such a positive mark on history and society despite their small numbers. (Sim explains in text at the end of Judenhass how and why he chose the quotes he included in his book.)

But Judenhass, despite its good intentions, made more manifest by the fact that Sim is not a Jew and intends for the graphic novel to function as a wake-up call for the non-Jewish world, is hamstrung by its choppy structure.

From its listing of anti-Semitic viewpoints and actions, it then jumps to the famous story of U.S. President Harry Truman's emotional meeting with an old Jewish friend and business partner, which galvanized him to recognize the newly created state of Israel, and follows it with the poignant speech, decrying anti-Semitism, made by Pope John Paul II at Yad Vashem, Israel's Holocaust museum, in 2000, before returning to the present and some recent contentious remarks about Jews made by the likes of the late actor Marlon Brando, among others.

Unlike Eisner's similarly themed, admittedly preachy but effective The Plot: The Secret Story of The Protocols of the Elders of Zion, Judenhass is muddled. Why stick in the uplifting Truman and Pope John Paul II anecdotes if the point of your book is to expose the anti-Jewish racism that won't ever go away? As it is, that optimistic viewpoint undercuts the rest of Judenahass. Admirably well meant as it is, Sim's graphic novel is not as thought out as it might have been.

Much more emotionally effective is Good-bye Marianne: The Graphic Novel, the comic book adaptation of Irene Watts' 10-year-old award-winning young adult novel. Marianne Koch is an 11-year-old Jewish resident of Berlin, who post-Kristallnacht, is feeling the effects of the anti-Semitic realities that are being made more manifest day by day as the Nazis begin their steps toward destroying Germany's Jews.

Taking place over a few weeks, Good-bye Marianne begins with the young girl's expulsion from school, as all Jewish children were, her run-ins with various Germans who voice anti-Semitic attitudes and, finally, her being forced to leave her beloved mother behind when she is chosen as one of the kindertransport children, who escaped the concentration camps to find refuge in England.

Beautifully and simply illustrated by Kathryn E. Shoemaker, in what are often stark sketches, Good-bye Marianne powerfully brings home with force what it must have been like to be a Jew in Nazi Germany before the beginning of World War II when discriminatory measures gave a hint of the horrors to follow. Like Judenhass, Good-bye Marianne reaches for a shred of optimism and light amid the darkness, but these elements are more organic to the story in Watts' graphic novel and hence more successful than Sim's effort. It's a modest tale well told.

Stars of David win gold in multicultural tournament

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The Israeli Stars of David withstood a late charge from the Polish Hussars and held on for a 4-3 victory in the title game of the Canadian Multicultural Hockey Championships.

The win in the Canadian Multicultural Hockey League's premier division – the tourney's highest level – marked the first time in the tournament's four-year history that a Jewish team won the championship. The Stars defeated last year's champs, the Hussars, and the previous year's titlists, the Irish Shamrocks, in back-to-back playoff games to claim the title.

The Stars relied on team speed and finesse, compensating for a lineup depleted by injury and the departure of two key players early in the playoffs. They were also motivated by awareness of the conflict raging in the Middle East and the desire to provide supporters of Israel with a good news story, said team coach and manager Alex Voihanski.

Paced by tournament MVP and team captain Stacey Britstone, the Stars got better as the tournament progressed, peaking during the playoffs. They finished the round robin with a 2-1-1 record, good for second in their division, before winning three playoff games in a row.

The quarter-final saw them face off with the Italian Gladiators, but "it wasn't even close," said Voihanski. The Stars won 8-3, but the result could have been even more lopsided. Though the Italians came out strong, "our speed took over. They couldn't keep up with us."

Things didn't get tighter in the semis against the Irish Shamrocks, who beat the Stars' predecessors, the Maccabbees in the title game two years ago. Again relying on speed and finesse, the Stars cruised to an 8-4 victory. "The score was pretty flattering to the Shamrocks," Voihanski opined.

The Stars' performance to that point turned some heads, with one observer writing on the Canadian Multicultural Hockey League's website: "Although it might not be considered an upset, no one expected the Israeli Stars to blow out the two-time Canadian Cup Champions Irish Shamrocks 8-4. The Israelis came out flying, despite having a shorter bench and the Irish could not get in synch after a couple of bad goals giving the Stars of David a 5-2 lead."

The final was a closer contest – at least on the scoreboard, Voihanski said. The first period was pretty even, with the Stars showing some early game "jitters" and anxiety over the absence of top forward Michael Henrich, a former first-round pick of the NHL Edmonton Oilers. Henrich joined the Stars one game into the tourney and led the team in scoring with five goals and three assists in only four games. But as GTA scout for the Barrie Colts, he had to depart after the quarter-final to evaluate players in another tournament.

Alon Eizenman, a veteran of the Israeli national team and the French pro league, stepped into Henrich's spot on the top line with Britstone and Adam Weinberg, formerly of the University of Toronto Blues, and the team didn't miss a beat, Voihanski said.

With some 600 people – divided equally between Stars and Hussars fans – watching the final at Chesswood Arena, the teams battled to a 1-1 draw after one. In the second period, the Stars picked up the pace and "started to skate, to bring the speed." Momentum shifted to the Israeli side and they took a 2-1 lead. The Hussars tied it up, but then Britstone showed why he was MVP, staking the Stars to a 3-2 lead. Jordan Weinberg, one of three brothers on the team, gave the Stars a two-goal bulge and the Hussars made it close only in the dying seconds, scoring a "garbage goal" off a scramble in front of the Israelis' net.

"We outplayed them pretty badly after the first period," Voihanski said.

Adding to the Stars' accomplishment was the fact that a key defenceman, Daniel Spivak, left before the semifinal to play for his NCAA team at the Rochester Institute of Technology, while Daniel Mandel missed the semifinal and final due to injury. Others stepped up, Voihanski said, including Ryan Goldberg, a defenceman with Stouffville Spirit and Aaron Stein, who played for the University of Western Ontario.

Britstone, who also played for Western after two years in the OHL with Plymouth and Oshawa, said the Stars youth and speed were key to the team's success. Going into the tournament "we knew we had a good team, but we didn't expect to win it, not at all," especially with key players leaving early.

Britstone, who played in last year's tournament and in the Jewish World Cup in Israel in 2007, downplayed his selection as MVP. "It's nice, of course but it more reflects how the team played," he said.

The Stars' lineup featured a number of quality players with U.S. and Canadian college experience, as well as Tier II Junior level skaters. Adam and Jordan Weinberg were joined by a third brother, Bryan, a left winger who plays with Mississauga Chargers. Ryan Goldberg and Aaron Stein were strong on defence.

Kevin Kliman, a onetime goalie with Brown University (NCAA Division I), backstopped the Stars.

The blessings of music

I am not very athletic, although I do love cycling when the weather permits. During the winter, I exercise every morning at a nearby health club, with some of the time spent on a stationary bicycle. The main reason I prefer the stationary bicycle to the other "machines" is that I can read and listen to classical music while cycling. That reading is my treat of the day – the health club cycling is my excuse for reading.

Recently, I finished two wonderful books, Daniel Levitan's This is Your Brain on Music and Oliver Sacks' most recent tome, Musicophilia. The two complementary books have enhanced my understanding and appreciation of music, both personally and professionally, by looking at its potential impact on many of the conditions associated with aging.

The Senior Side of Life

I have, over the years, supported the various music programs provided to our clients at Baycrest, and have learned a great deal from our very dedicated and creative music therapists.

What the two books did for me was to coalesce what I have known informally and from clinical observation into a more cohesive understanding of music. They helped me comprehend the underlying theoretical and observed workings of music, and determine the physiological, neurological and psychological processes that govern the appreciation of and, in many cases, the need for music.

The books thus helped me understand how music can be so effective in the totality of care for many of our elderly, disabled, cognitively impaired and dependent clients.

While Levitan gives a robust and engaging understanding of the scientific underpinnings of how and why music seems to be so important, Sacks uses his vast clinical experience of medical anecdotes to illustrate the impact of music on many conditions he has been asked to consult on as a neurologist.

I have had a particular interest in dementia and other neurological and mental health disorders affecting older people, and Sacks focuses on how music interacts with individuals so afflicted.

In his chapter on Parkinson's disease and music therapy, Sacks describes his own experience with the use of music therapy for his Parkinson's patients whose disease resulted in the influenza brain infection that followed World War I. This became the basis of his book and movie of the same name, Awakenings. He eloquently describes the beneficial effects of music on the movements of many of his patients, which I have also witnessed in my own practice.

He concludes as follows: "It is music that the Parkinsonian needs, for only music, which is rigorous yet spacious, sinuous and alive, can evoke responses that are equally so. And he needs not only the metrical structure of rhythm and the free movement of melody – its contours and trajectories, its ups and downs, its tensions and relaxations – but the 'will' and intentionality of music, to allow him to regain the freedom of his kinetic melody."

Sacks also describes the benefits of music in those suffering from dementia.

Amy Clements Cortes, the senior music therapist at the Baycrest Centre, echoes his message: "Music serves as a means of communication for those where the function of language has become challenging or lost… music is processed by many different parts of the brain rather than in just one centre as in language… It is one of life's earliest experiences, and in late adulthood, musical memories remain as some of the most deeply rooted… it is important to target music… as this music is often successful in helping clients retrieve memories they would otherwise not be able to access."

Music is part of our individual and collective souls – so play on.

Dr. Michael Gordon is medical program director of palliative care at Baycrest and co-author with Bart Mindszenthy of Parenting Your Parents (Dundurn Press).

GARLIC-SMASHED POTATOES

- 16 unpeeled small Yukon Gold potatoes
- 3 tblsp chopped fresh chives
- 6 lrg garlic cloves, peeled
- 1 tblsp olive oil
- 1/4 stick butter
- 1/2 c sour cream

Salt & pepper to taste

Generously grease baking dish. Cook potatoes and garlic in medium pot of boiling salted water until potatoes are tender, about 15 minutes. Drain; cool. Discard garlic. Arrange potatoes close together in prepared dish. Using a spoon, smash potatoes until they split open. Drizzle with oil; dot with butter. Sprinkle with salt and pepper. Preheat broiler. Broil potatoes until crisp and golden about 8-10 minutes, watching closely to avoid burning. Top with dollops of sour cream; sprinkle with chives.

Limmud celebates all possibilities

Epi on Education

Having just returned from the Limmud Conference in England, I would be remiss in not reporting on that exhilarating experience.

Seymour Epstein

For many years now, British Jews have accustomed themselves to the fact that during the winter break, thousands of their lot assemble at a university campus outside London for four to five days of Jewish immersion. This year, there were more than 2,000 at the University of Warwick in Coventry.

Each day is filled with lectures, chevrutah study, workshops, panel discussions and concerts from early in the morning until very late at night. The topics range across a virtual rainbow of ideologies, interests, passions and lifestyles. This is true pluralistic Jewish learning and culture, in that nothing stays pareve, and every possible Jewish position of the 21st century is both represented and given full respect.

Limmud is a celebration of all the Jewish possibilities for growth and development in the time and place we currently inhabit. Go to www.limmud.org to get all the information you need, but like Coca-Cola or Shabbat, a description is insufficient to give you the real taste.

Fortunately, Toronto Jews can get that taste at Limmud Toronto 2009, on Feb. 15 at the University of Toronto's Bahen Centre, and www.limmud.ca will tell you all about that event.

One of the fascinating aspects of Limmud is the age range of participants. There were youthful singles, young families with lots of children (for whom there was constant planned activity), everyone in the middle, and many senior citizens.

All of them came to broaden their Jewish experience and deepen their Jewish knowledge. Limmud exists in 25 different countries and 45 communities. Limmud conferences in places such as Russia, Ukraine, and Turkey are a testament to the flourishing of Jewish life in the strangest of places. What excites me most about this phenomenon is that it illustrates once again how Jewish continuity is not an adequate goal for Jewish education. Rather, Jewish creativity through literacy are the correct objectives for a better Jewish future.

Epi (Seymour Epstein) is the vice-president of Jewish Education at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Israel: your sons are our sons

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

"Two of my three sons were called for duty, but I don't know where they are."

This is from an e-mail I received from a cousin in Israel. She and her husband have three boys, all of whom serve in the Israel Defence Forces (IDF).

URBAN WRITER

In 2006, my cousin and her husband, both olim, watched as her eldest boy went off to fight in Lebanon against Hezbollah. This time, their two other sons may be entering Gaza to fight Hamas.

"But I don't know where they are."

This part of my cousin's message was the most difficult. Her two boys are fighters and may be ordered to enter Gaza and make their way over booby-trapped bridges and battle hand to hand with enemies hiding behind children and in mosques.

Or maybe those orders won't come. She and her husband just don't know.

Just as difficult for my cousins is the fact they do know what lies in the hearts of their boys, their sensitive boys.

The Torah says Jacob was frightened and distressed by the knowledge that his brother, Esau, was coming. The commentaries say he was frightened because he might be killed and distressed because he might have to kill.

My cousin tells me she won't ask them, but she knows that her sons are both frightened and distressed for the same reasons as Jacob. What do parents do with this knowledge?

Most of us in the Diaspora have never been army parents. We're safe Jews. Our 18-year-olds won't go off this morning to fight in hell. The closest they'll get to the front is surfing their favourite Israeli websites. We're lucky, because our boys and girls are sitting in their economics classes or in their offices working the phones for another account.

Let us, therefore, use our position of safety and lend support to our Israeli family. Let us publicly and openly thank our brothers and sisters in Israel for being the guardians of our homeland and our people.

Let us express our appreciation to them for their courageous and brave decision to live in Eretz Yisrael, knowing full well that one day, their sons and daughters will be called up to fight for the Jewish people.

Let us pray for their children and always be vigilant and informed about the war in Gaza, and promise that not a moment will go by during the course of our day when they're not on our minds.

And to you our brave Israeli family, we say: "When we look at the pictures on our desks of our sons and daughters, we will close our eyes and think about your children who are in harm's way and ask God to ensure that everyone returns home safely. Your sons are our sons, and ours are yours."

To the Israeli people, we promise that we will print this line – "Two of my three sons were called for duty, but I don't know where they are" – and paste it where all of our family can read it. And when we do, we will remind ourselves to be eternally indebted to you for your ability to be strong and righteous in such daunting hours. We will remember that your boys are in harm's way for us, the Jewish people. And we will hug our children just a little bit tighter.

As I write this, Israel's first army son has just been lost to the battle: Staff Sgt. Dvir Emmanueloff, 22, from Givat Ze'ev, near Jerusalem.

Rest in peace, Dvir. Thank you!

May God watch over the Jewish people and the State of Israel.

EU leaders pledge to stop Hamas from rearming

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspapers Ltd.

JERUSALEM — One day after Israel announced a unilateral ceasefire in the Gaza Strip, six key European leaders pledged to work to prevent Hamas from rearming.

The commitments were offered on Sunday at a summit in Sharm al Sheikh in Egypt and at a meeting in Jerusalem with Prime Minister Ehud Olmert.

The six leaders were British Prime Minister Gordon Brown, French President Nicolas Sarkozy, German Chancellor Angela Merkel, Italian Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi, Spanish Prime Minister Jose Luis Rodriguez Zapatero and Czech Prime Minister Mirek Topolanek, who currently holds the European Union's rotating presidency. In co-operation with Egypt and the United States, they offered to provide troops and technological assistance to prevent Hamas from smuggling weapons and terrorists into the Gaza Strip.

The leaders expressed support for the ceasefire in Gaza and for an end to Palestinian rocket fire on southern Israel.

Olmert said that on Saturday, he received a letter from European Union leaders pledging co-operation in halting the arms smuggling into Gaza.

At the start of the Jerusalem meeting, Olmert said that Israel has no intention of staying in the Gaza Strip or reconquering it, despite its three-week offensive against Hamas in the coastal territory.

The six leaders met with Olmert following the conference in Sharm al Sheikh, where they spoke with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas. During the meeting, Olmert reiterated his regret over the Palestinian civilians killed and wounded during Operation Cast Lead in Gaza.

"We did not want to hurt them or their children," he said. "They are the victims of Hamas."

None of the European leaders condemned Israel for these casualties.

Canadians largely neutral in Gaza conflict

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The majority of Canadians are solidly on the sidelines when it comes to picking sides in the recent conflict in Gaza, but of those who have chosen sides, a plurality supports Israel by nearly a three-to-one margin, according to a recent Ipsos Reid poll.

The poll found that of the 85 per cent of Canadians who have been following the conflict, 36 per cent think Canada should "take sides with Israel" rather than favouring the Palestinians and Hamas. Only 13 per cent of respondents say Canada should favour the Palestinians and Hamas. The majority of Canadians, 51 per cent, said Canada should favour neither side or they didn't know who to back.

The poll canvassed 1,000 Canadians from coast to coast and was conducted from Jan. 6 to 8.

Addressing the issue of whether Israel has used excessive or appropriate force in responding to Hamas rocket attacks, 49 per cent said the force used was excessive, while 39 per cent called it appropriate. Thirteen per cent didn't know or refused to answer.

Canadians placed responsibility for the crisis squarely with the Palestinians and Hamas. Asked who they believe "is most to blame for the current conflict," 43 per cent fingered the Palestinians and Hamas.

Diplomats Relocated

OTTAWA — Canada's representative office to the Palestinian Authority in Ramallah has been functioning with a skeletal staff after most personnel were transferred to Jerusalem for safety reasons due to the conflict in Gaza, the newspaper Embassy reported last week. The Foreign Affairs Department confirmed the move, which an Embassy source said was taken shortly after hostilities began out of fear of attacks.

Neo-Nazis Join Rally

CALGARY — Members of the Aryan Guard, a neo-Nazi group, took part in a Jan. 10 protest in Calgary against Israel's actions in Gaza, the Calgary Herald reported. The white supremacists marched near the front of the crowd holding a modified Israeli flag that read "Terror State." Protest organizer Shadi Abuid said the neo-Nazis were told they weren't welcome, but "you can't deny people's right to walk." A spokesperson for Anti-Racist Action Calgary who was at the event said it was "unfortunate" the Aryan Guard members didn't face much opposition at the protest. The rally, which drew 1,200 people, was one of many similar ones held across Canada on Jan. 10.

Vandals Hit Lobby

LONDON — A group of Palestinian supporters vandalized the offices of a pro-Israel lobby in London. They entered the offices of British Israel Communication & Media, a Jewish community-financed group set up in 2001 to explain Israel's position to the British media. The vandals used loudspeakers to shout anti-Israel messages and scare staff and then turned over desks, cut phone lines and threw around leaflets before running away. Police said that when they arrived, they dealt with a "suspected package, and made it safe." They are trying to find those responsible.

Yemeni Jews Moved

SANA'A, Yemen — The government of Yemen is relocating a Jewish community for safety reasons. A Jewish man from Yemen's Amran province was murdered last month, and members of the 266-person community have been the victim of verbal and stone-throwing assaults since the Israeli invasion of Gaza began, according to Yemeni press reports. The Yemeni government has allocated buildings to house the Jews in the capital of Sana'a, and also will give each of the approximately 50 families being relocated the equivalent of about $10,000. The relocation was to take place Sunday. The government said the houses and other property of the relocated Jews will remain theirs, and they can sell them if they wish.

Messages From U.K.

LONDON — Warning messages sent to the cellphones of Israeli soldiers and their families originated from the United Kingdom, according to reports. The text messages received Jan. 13 by hundreds of cellphones across Israel warned soldiers of their fate if they entered Gaza. According to media reports in Britain and Israel, checks of the code from the sender's number revealed the texts originated in the United Kingdom. Initially, it was assumed the text messages were part of Hamas psychological warfare and were sent from Gaza. The messages, sent in English, read: "Come on into Gaza. Lots of surprises waiting for your sons, the least of which is death – Hamas."

Hadassah Sheds Staff

NEW YORK — Hadassah: the Women's Zionist Organization of America has instituted massive layoffs. The organization began laying off 80 employees across the country Jan. 13, roughly one-quarter of its national staff, a spokesperson said. The cuts are at all levels. Hadassah recently said it had $40 million invested in Bernard Madoff's Ponzi scam, as well as another $50 million it thought it had made in the scheme. It was a major hit to its endowment, which now stands at $412 million (US). The layoffs, however, weren't solely caused by the Madoff losses. Hadassah had been discussing streamlining for nearly two years. The stock market downturn and the Madoff losses accelerated the process, the spokesperson said.

Islamists Threaten Madonna

LONDON — Madonna has beefed up her security with two ex-Mossad bodyguards following threats on an Islamist website, according to a British newspaper.

The People newspaper also reported Jan. 11 that the singer has instructed ex-husband Guy Ritchie to increase security for their three children. On the site, which is password protected, the extremists chatted about assassinating Madonna without referring specifically to her contacts with Israel or Judaism.

The newspaper reported that the "threat was made by Muhammad Abdel-Al, leader of the Popular Resistance Committees – a fringe group of Palestinian militia who have launched thousands of rocket attacks on Israel."

Madonna's involvement in Kabbalah is well-known, and she has visited Israel several times.

A source close to Madonna said the pop icon "is beside herself with worry, not just for her own safety but for that of the children."

JTA and British newspapers reported this month that the anti-terrorism branch of the British police warned prominent Jews to be extra vigilant and review their security arrangements. The Community Security Trust, the organization in charge of security for the Jewish community and its institutions in Britain, offered similar advice following the rise in anti-Semitic attacks since the start of Israel's military operation in Gaza on Dec. 27.

Police asked to investigate anti-Israel protests

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A man clutching a Hezbollah flag promising that "this is going to wipe you off the planet"; youngsters chanting in Arabic, "Palestine is ours and the Jews are our dogs"; a woman screaming hysterically at nearby counter-protesters, "Jewish child… You're going to f...in' die. Hamas is coming for you… F... off"; calls for Hezbollah chieftain Hassan Nasrallah to "strike Tel Aviv"; a demonstrator carrying a poster with the epithet "Nazisrael."

Video can be seen at cjnews.com

Those images of demonstrators, many with their faces contorted in rage, were recorded at anti-Israel demonstrations over the past few weeks in Toronto, Montreal and Calgary and have been distributed to the RCMP and local police by Canadian Jewish Congress.

Law enforcement agencies have been asked to examine the videos to determine whether the demonstrators crossed the bounds of acceptable discourse and strayed into criminal violations of anti-hate laws, spokespeople for Canadian Jewish Congress and the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) told a news conference in Toronto last week.

The videos have been posted on YouTube and a number of blogs and can be seen at www.cjnews.com.

The events that took place on Canadian streets go far beyond Canadian norms of civility and would shock Canadians if they knew of them, said Congress CEO Bernie Farber.

The organizations that sponsored the rallies ought to "denounce the horrendous expressions of anti-Semitism and calls to genocide that occurred," he said. "It is necessary at such times for all of us to stand together and isolate hate. The law is only one instrument. It is Canadians collectively that can provide the best remedy. Only by speaking out against such vile intolerance – be you a political leader, a labour leader or an average citizen – can we truly defeat such fanaticism," Farber said.

The Canadian demonstrations coincided with protests in cities around the world against Israel's attack on Hamas in Gaza. Thousands have taken to the streets in London, Paris, South Africa and the Middle East.

Referring to those events, Farber warned that "the hateful energy we see being promulgated on our streets" could escalate to actual violence as it has in New York, London and Sweden. Synagogues in Antwerp and London have been firebombed, lit rags were pushed through the mail slot of a Jewish home in Belgium, Islamic extremists are said to have prepared hit lists of Jewish leaders in Britain, and Hamas has announced that Jewish children anywhere are legitimate targets for murder.

"And all this we believe stems from the hateful energy we see being promulgated on our streets. We do not want similar hate-filled episodes here in Canada," Farber said.

He noted that in Calgary, members of the white supremacist Aryan Guard felt comfortable marching with pro-Hamas protesters.

CIC executive vice-president Sara Saber-Freedman said shouts at a rally in Montreal referred to a battle against Jews in the seventh century and "is in effect a call for death to the Jews."

If the extreme rhetoric is not denounced by rally organizers, those protesters will feel their behaviour is acceptable. It's a moral issue, Saber-Freedman said. "This kind of rhetoric leads to violence."

The rallies were sponsored by unions and church groups, as well as Muslim, Arab and Palestinian organizations. Farber called on them to "immediately denounce those who utilize the language of hate and violence here in Canada. Each should clearly separate their organizations from such language."

Outside the news conference, sponsored by Congress and the CIC, the Jewish community's lobbying arm for Israel, a handful of protesters argued that the two organizations were attempting to distract attention from Israel's attack on Gaza.

Inside the news conference, a reporter noted that slurs came from both sides at demonstrations. Farber said if there were calls for genocide from pro-Israel protesters and something equivalent to comparing Jews with Nazis, "in a New York minute, I'd denounce it."

Kudos for Canadian courage

From the editor's desk...

Little discussed in the commentary surrounding the abrupt unilateral declaration of ceasefire by Israel in Gaza that took effect Sunday morning was the high-level involvement of the key western nations in the European Union.

Even as details of the ceasefire were still being finalized, the EU gave its full promise to Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak and the government of Israel that it would assist in helping to bring stability to Gaza.

Mubarak and French President Nicolas Sarkozy jointly chaired a summit meeting at Sharm el Sheikh on Sunday at which they publicly prescribed the only possibility of peace in Gaza.

Sarkozy, of course, re-emphasized his belief in a two-state solution as the only means to resolve the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. "We should continue and we should accelerate our efforts in order to achieve a settlement based on the creation of two states, a Palestinian state living side by side with an Israeli state that has the right to its security," he told reporters.

But insofar as the Gaza component of the solution is concerned, he added: "We have pledged to help Israel and Egypt with all the technical, military, naval and diplomatic ways to help end the smuggling of weapons into Gaza."

In this the French president was not alone. The day before, according to Ha'aretz, on Saturday, British Prime Minister Gordon Brown offered the services of Britain's navy to help prevent arms smuggling into Gaza.

In Germany, Chancellor Angela Merkel's office released a statement indicating that she, Brown and Sarkozy had sent letters to Israeli and Egyptian leaders expressing a willingness to take a series of concrete measures to combat arms smuggling. The paper reported that Merkel had expressed support for the efforts of the Israeli and Egyptian governments to reach a lasting ceasefire in Gaza.

Earlier in the week, of course, the United States and Israel signed a mutual assistance pact also regarding the prevention of arms smuggling into Gaza.

On Sunday evening, six European heads of government made what was described as "a lightning visit" to Jerusalem to very visibly, very demonstratively, lend their support to the ceasefire process and, what is more, to pledge their active assistance in making it work, that is, in preventing Hamas from re-arming.

Reading very clearly and definitively between the lines of these very high-profile demonstrations of commitment and support from the European leaders was the unexpressed but brazenly obvious assertion that Hamas cannot be trusted to desist from smuggling arms.

And underpinning the entire edifice of that distrust and of the accompanying sense of urgency is the open knowledge that the Hamas rulers have made Gaza a satellite of Iran and an instrument of Iranian foreign policy.

The radical Shia Islamist regime threatens Israel to be sure, but it also threatens Egypt and the other western-looking Sunni regimes in the Middle East. As a result, the shadow of Iranian mischief and menace falls troublingly across Europe as well.

The Intelligence and Terrorism Information Center in Israel reported last week that "Iranian leader Ali Khamenei is personally involved in directing the strategic support provided to Hamas by Iran. That support in a practice is overseen by the Iranian Revolutionary Guards Quds Force, headed by Qassem Suleimani and by Iran's ministry of intelligence and Security, headed by Mouhsen Hussein Azahi."

During the Sharm El Sheikh press conference, Sarkozy made a remark that deserved much greater emphasis. He said that the Gaza violence was part of a worldwide conflict (my emphasis). He was clearly referring to the conflict between the democracies, and indeed all peace-loving nations of the world and radical, Islamist terrorism.

One of the democracies that has unambiguously and courageously taken a stand against the threat posed by international terror is our very own Canada.

Canada was the only country among 47 to oppose what the government called a "deeply flawed" resolution against Israel at the United Nations' Human Rights gathering in Geneva last week.

"A lone voice of integrity," was how Toronto Star columnist Rosie DiManno described Canada for its principled stand against a motion that abusively singled out Israel and made no mention whatsoever of Hamas for human rights violations. Thirteen countries, mostly European, abstained, while 33 countries supported the vile motion.

Last week Jason Kenney, minister of citizenship, immigration and multiculturalism, reinforced this message of integrity when he visited the Chabad House in Mumbai. "The fact that people would come all the way to India to target a Jewish community centre indicates the depth of hatred and evil, of anti-Semitism in the [garb] of Islamist terrorism," Kenney said.

The government is to be commended.

It is one of the leaders in the fight against the forces of terror and extremism – Iran, Al Qaeda and their proxies - who target the "corrupt" West and who see Israel as the vanguard of the hated West in a Middle East that they are determined to make Judenrein.

Petition calls on CUPE to reject ban of Israeli academics

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

More than 3,700 academics at universities around the world have signed a petition calling on members of CUPE Ontario, Ontario's largest public service union, to reject a proposal to ban Israeli academics at Ontario campuses.

"The proposed ban clearly represents ethnic discrimination and the proposed ideological litmus test is a violation of free speech," states the petition, which is sponsored by Scholars for Peace in the Middle East (SPME).

"To show our solidarity with our Israeli academics in this matter, we, the undersigned, hereby declare ourselves to be Israeli academics for purposes of any academic boycott. We will regard ourselves as Israeli academics and decline to participate in any activity from which Israeli academics are excluded."

The petition was initiated by Ontario members of SPME and submitted to the organization's U.S.-based headquarters, said Sergio Grinstein, professor of biochemistry at the University of Toronto. With some modifications, it appeared on the SPME website (www.spme.net), and within four days, 3,500 academics had signed on. Its goal is 5,000 signatures.

SPME calls itself "a grassroots community of over 20,000 university and college professors, researchers, administrators, teachers, librarians and students on more than 1,500 campuses worldwide." Their goal is "a world in which Israel exists as a sovereign Jewish state within secure borders and her neighbours achieve their legitimate peaceful aspirations."

Grinstein, who also serves as senior scientist at the Hospital for Sick Children, said "colleagues in Israel and around the world are appalled by what is going on."

He was referring to a proposal by the Ontario wing of the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE) to ban Israeli academics from Canadian campuses because of a military attack by Israeli forces on the Islamic University in Gaza. Israel defended the attack, saying two labs in the facility were used by Hamas' military wing for research and development of explosives and that rockets and explosives were stored in the building.

CUPE Ontario stated the boycott resolution was requested by the Palestinian Federation of Unions of University Professors and Employees and was advanced by CUPE Ontario's university workers committee. It will be brought before the union's annual conference for deliberation.

Last week, CUPE Ontario president Sid Ryan backtracked from the union's original position after a widespread wave of criticism, which included a pointed rebuke from a broad range of Canadians, including CUPE's national office, editorial writers and CUPE members. He was also widely taken to task for saying the Israeli attack on the university was like "what the Nazis did."

Ryan apologized for that remark, and then last week, he modified his original statement, saying "the proposed international boycott will focus on Israeli academic institutions, not individuals.

"An academic boycott should focus on issues of investment, partnership, fundraising and joint projects," he said.

Ryan's announcement came one day after Paul Moist, CUPE national president, stated that "none of CUPE's over 2,000 chartered bodies – including CUPE Ontario – have adopted such a resolution. I believe such a resolution is wrong and would violate the anti-discrimination standards set out in the CUPE constitution. I will be using my influence in any debates on such a resolution to oppose its adoption."

While critical of the CUPE Ontario resolution, Moist went on to condemn both the Hamas rocket attacks on Israel "and the Israeli government's disproportionate response."

Also last week, the Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies urged Moist and CUPE Ontario's membership to call for Ryan's resignation, saying that "a series of blatantly anti-Semitic and discriminatory acts and comments by Mr. Ryan… cast doubt over his ability to lead the Ontario section of Canada's largest union."

Meanwhile, a second large public service union weighed in on the issue with a call on the federal government to condemn Israel's "military assault on the people of Gaza."

Denis Lemelin, national president of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers (CUPW) called on Prime Minister Stephen Harper to push for "cessation of the ongoing Israeli siege of Gaza, which has resulted in the collective punishment of the entire Gaza population."

Calling the Israeli attack a "massacre of people in Gaza," Lemelin urged the government "to adopt a program of boycott, divestment and sanctions until Israel recognizes the right of the Palestinian people to self determination and complies with international law."

In other developments, Toronto District School Board (TDSB) trustee Josh Matlow moved a resolution before the TDSB's programs and school services committee that would require CUPE local 4400, representing Toronto education workers, to comply with board directives to avoid expressing partisan viewpoints on the Mideast conflict. The motion also called for a letter to be sent to Ryan expressing the TDSB's disapproval of his comparison of Israel to the Nazi regime and his support for an academic boycott.

Matlow said the motion will be on the TDSB's agenda at its Feb. 4 meeting.

STUDENTS BACK ISRAEL

More than 1,000 people braved the cold weather and the snow on Sunday to gather at Dundas Square in Toronto to show their support for Israel one day after it declared a ceasefire in Gaza after a three-week war waged in an effort to stop rocket attacks into Israel. Those who took part in the rally, which was organized by students of the Canadian Centre for Israel Activism, Hasbara Fellowships and Hillel of Greater Toronto, proudly waved flags, prayed for peace and celebrated the ceasefire.

Canadian agencies gets $2.3M from Claims Conference

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Canadian social service agencies have been allocated $2.3 million (US) by the Claims Conference to help Holocaust survivors in Canada this year.

Canada is one of 43 countries that will receive a total of $168 million (US) in assistance in 2009.

"In these times of severe crisis for Jewish philanthropy, the need for the Claims Conference funds for social services is even more essential to the well-being of elderly Nazi victims," Claims Conference chair Julius Berman said last week in a statement.

He added: "The Claims Conference is committed to addressing the growing needs of Nazi victims as they age and to easing, as much as possible, the lives of elderly Nazi victims in their last years."

Officially known as the Conference of Jewish Material Claims Against Germany, the Claims Conference was established after World War II to recover proceeds from unclaimed Jewish property in what was then East Germany and to administer social service grants from the German government.

The organizations in Toronto due to receive grants are Baycrest ($455,000), Circle of Care ($887,891) and Jewish Family and Child ($255,267).

Also in line for funds are Jewish Family Services of Ottawa ($40,000) and the Jewish Family Service Agency of Vancouver ($155,000) and the Vancouver Holocaust Education Centre ($16,500).

The allocations in Canada will be used for home care for the house-bound, as well as medical assistance, food programs, transportation, emergency cash grants and socialization programs.

In an interview, Greg Schneider, CEO of the New York-based Claims Conference, said Canadian organizations will receive $100,000 more this year than in 2008.

"In these depressed economic times, with Jewish philanthropy in crisis, [we] felt it was important to maintain and even increase funding for survivors," he noted. "Seventy years ago, the world abandoned these Jews, and today, we cannot abandon them again in their last years when they need so much."

The Claims Conference provides a wide range of services, including:

- In-home services that help survivors with such activities as housekeeping, bathing, dressing, laundry and shopping;
- Service programs that enable a variety of agencies to provide such services as home care, money management and meals on wheels;
- Expanded services in Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Uruguay and Mexico.

* * *

The Claims Conference also announced this month that it has allocated more than $400,000 to assist survivors in areas of southern Israel under rocket attack from the Gaza Strip.

Gaza crisis blamed on Palestinians, Hamas

Only 18 per cent said the Israelis were more to blame and 39 per cent said neither, or didn't know or would not answer.

Canadians were also asked whether they supported the creation of a Palestinian state. Forty-two per cent of those following the issue favoured that position, while 35 per cent were against it. The remainder didn't know or refused to answer.

John Wright, senior vice-president of Ipsos Reid public relations, said Canadians understand the defence needs of Israel, but at the same time "there is a belief that Israel's response has been excessive. Twelve hundred [Palestinians] have been killed in the conflict on one side and six on the other side… When 1,200 people are caught in the middle, the poll showed that tempers people's views."

Those casualties, he said, "are a mitigating factor" in the support for Israel.

Wright said the poll is consistent with findings following two earlier conflicts. In 2002, at the height of the second intifadah, 48 per cent of Canadians supported neither side, while 16 per cent backed Israel and 12 per cent the Palestinians. In August 2006, during the Lebanon war, 19 per cent blamed Israel for the war and 47 per cent blamed others in the region.

While a plurality of Canadians support Israel, at 36-13, the margin "is pretty thin," he added.

Moshe Ronen, chair of the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC), the Jewish community's advocacy arm on Israel, had another take on the poll.

"People following the current conflict understand that Israel is defending itself in the most civil way possible against a most uncivil enemy, Hamas," he said. "People realize that the threat of Islamic fundamentalism is the kind of threat Canadians worry about and that this battle is part of the international war against terrorism.

"Canadians realize Israel faces challenges in terms of defending its citizens." They saw Israel absorb attacks and they respect the restraint shown by Israel despite thousands of missiles fired at it. "Canadians are on board and fed up with the Palestinians' failures to choose a leadership to take advantage of the opportunities given to them," he said.

Ronen said Canadians are likely also influenced by the position taken by the Canadian government, which has been supportive of Israel, as well as the favourable comments by Liberal leader Michael Ignatieff, who condemned the Hamas rocket attacks, called for an immediate end to those attacks and affirmed Israel's right to defend itself.

Fighting ends, for now

As of this writing, the war in the Gaza Strip has stopped. For now. After a special motza'ei Shabbat convening of the cabinet, the government of Israel unilaterally declared a ceasefire that took effect at 2 a.m. Sunday.

True to form, Hamas responded with a final volley of 17 more missile and mortar rounds aimed at the civilians of southern Israel. Then it acceded to the ceasefire.

Bombastically and with the silly surrealism of an emperor wearing no clothes, Khaled Meshal, the Hamas leader headquartered at a very safe remove from the fighting in Gaza in the Bashar Assad protectorate of Damascus, announced that Hamas will halt all military activity and give Israeli troops one week to pull out of the Gaza Strip, demanding, too, that Israel end the blockade of the Hamas government and open the border crossings.

The Israel Defence Forces will maintain a presence in Gaza until the nature of Hamas' actions, if not its intentions, toward Israel becomes clearer over the next few weeks.

Mark Regev, the spokesperson for Israel's Prime Minister's Office told the world that Israel "clearly does not want to" stay in Gaza, but that the Jewish state, nevertheless, would do everything it needed to maintain the calm. "If in fact we see a cessation of Hamas activity towards Israel, then we could see a long-term ceasefire," he told Sky News.

As Prime Minister Ehud Olmert himself pointed out, the IDF will continue to operate in Gaza if Hamas continues to target Israeli citizens.

Despite contrary pronouncements, it's not clear whether all of Israel's military objectives were achieved by the war. After all, Hamas was able to launch rockets and mortars into southern Israel and beyond, throughout the three-week military campaign. Some smuggling tunnels undoubtedly escaped damage. And young Gilad Schalit's whereabouts, let alone his health, remains a mystery (although, in truth, his rescue was not among the specific pre-war military objectives).

To be sure, Israel achieved a significant military victory. Hamas leaders were caught off guard by the fury and resolve of Israel's response. The terrorists' capacity to harm Israel has been significantly impaired. Moreover, Hamas and any other like-minded terrorist groups will surely pay heavy regard in the future to the likelihood of punishing Israeli retaliation for attempts to harm Israelis.

Israel's decision to unilaterally declare a ceasefire was no doubt also influenced by non-military factors, such as the key involvement of Egypt (as well as Saudi Arabia in the non-spotlighted background) in working with Europe and the United States to try to find viable solutions to stopping weapons smuggling through the tunnels; sensitivity to international criticism concerning the number of civilian deaths in Gaza, and the imminence of the Obama inauguration.

For the Gaza operation to have reached a true ending, the West must join the fight against Islamist terrorism. Time will tell if, as the circumstances of last week's ceasefire suggest, it has and if, as a result, peace will finally come to the people of Gaza and Israel.

Where were our brothers and sisters?

On Jan. 4, I, a Holocaust survivor, along with 14 brave members of Amitie Quebec-Israel, including several courageous non-Jews, stood up against the Palestinian Solidarity demonstration that was held in front of Israel's consulate here in Montreal.

The pro-Palestinian demonstrators endured the cold weather in order to powerfully scream their anti-Israel and pro-Hamas propaganda. Their demonstration was well attended by about 1,000 people, and well organized – and well covered, of course, by the media.

Where were our brothers and sisters? Shamefully, they chose the warmth and pleasantry of their homes. I am extremely sad and embarrassed that they chose to stay home and not to come out in support of the embattled State of Israel. And, unlike Jewish communities in other major cities – Paris, London, Brussels and even Germany – this passivity continues. We have not had a major public demonstration in support of embattled Israel. Where are our "leaders," religious and communal?

Olmert gov't has done something right

With the retaliatory military invasion to rid Gaza of Hamas, the Olmert-Livni-Barak government has finally done something right and, as such, it to be highly commended for this. However, let's not forget that the past strategic track records of these three incumbents comprise, by and large, numerous colossal, dismal policy failures. They include then-Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak's panic exit of the military occupation of South Lebanon in 2001, which enabled Hezbollah to fill the resulting vacuum (Hezbollah ultimately wreaked havoc on the northern third of Israel in the 2006 Second Lebanon War with thousands of missiles), and the Kadima government's misguided 2005 unilateral withdrawal from Gaza. To quote the Jerusalem Post's editor Caroline Glick, "If Israel had not withdrawn its military forces from Gaza and forcibly expelled 8,000 Israeli citizens from their homes and farms in September 2005, it would not be fighting this war today."

CUPE should call for Ryan's resignation

I believe it is the duty of Canadian Union of Public Employees as a national Canadian union to demand the resignation of Sid Ryan, the president of its Ontario wing. Ryan's proposal, which he brought to CUPE's membership, to ban from Canadian university and college campuses all Israeli academics – and by implication, all Jews or any other supporters of Israel – who will not publicly toe his party line on the Middle East.

His proposal's blatantly discriminatory character opposes everything CUPE stands for, not to mention that it is an encouragement of further racism and anti-Semitism. In my judgment, his calling for and putting forward this proposal morally disqualifies him from participating in civil discourse in Canadian public life and should prevent him from being involved in any academic affairs at any Canadian university as a representative of CUPE. By his call for a boycott of Israeli academics and Israel supporters on campus, he has compromised his union's ability to be trusted as a body that respects the very existence of free academic institutions. There is no room for bigotry, anti-Semitism, and hatred in Ontario or in Canada, and especially on its university and college campuses.

Gaza offensive

If the Israeli occupation was half as brutal as the Palestinians allege, they surely would have done everything in their power to ensure that Israel did not re-occupy Gaza after leaving it unilaterally. Instead, the Palestinians did everything they could to make sure that Israel did re-occupy Gaza. The offensive in Gaza is not the first time that Israel has left territory, only to return in response to Palestinian terror.

A short history of 'disproportionate force'

By SETH FRANTZMAN
Special to The CJN

Within hours of Israel launching massive air strikes on the Gaza Strip in response to Hamas' firing of more than 100 rockets at Israel over three days, the international community was already reverting to form in its complaints that Israel was using "disproportionate force."

On Dec. 27, not long after Israel began striking Hamas police stations and terrorist infrastructure in Gaza, the European Union condemned Israel's "disproportionate use of force."

This cycle of terrorism, Israeli reactions and condemnations of "disproportionate force" is common in the Middle East. In July 2006, the United Nations' chief humanitarian officer, Jan Egeland, complained that Israel had used disproportionate force in Lebanon. On July 13, the European Union also claimed that Israel was using such force. On July 27, the prime minister of Turkey did the same, regarding Gaza. Matti Vanhanen, prime minister of Finland, also said the same thing. In 2004, then-UN secretary general Kofi Annan complained that Israel must stop using "disproportionate force in densely populated areas."

Israel isn't the only country that's been accused of using disproportionate force. During its war with Georgia in 2008, Russia was also accused by the United States and NATO of using disproportionate force.

Where did this idea that disproportionate force is wrong come from? Do western nations and leaders that complain about such use of force really live up to such preaching in their own countries? What is the history of the use of disproportionate force in war?

One of the problems with the term disproportionate force is that it has no accepted definition in international law or elsewhere. In "Sense and nonsense about disproportionate force," George Fletcher, a law professor at Columbia University, wrote in 2006 that had Britain bombed Buenos Aires during the Falklands War, "in that context [bombing] would have been unnecessary and, therefore, could not possibly qualify as proportionate."

However, he notes that whereas criminal law deals with proportionate force in self defence, international law has never dealt with this question. "I know of no case in the international version of shooting escaping looters where a court has affirmed that the use of force was necessary, but not proportionate."

In response to Washington's condemnation of Russia's use of force last year in Georgia, Dmitry Rogozin, Russia's ambassador to NATO, said that "the use of force to defend one's compatriots is traditionally regarded as a form of self defence," and he claimed that NATO and the United States had used disproportionate force in Bosnia, Iraq and Afghanistan.

A casualty of a Grad rocket attack on Ashkelon earlier this month.

But this brings us no closer to what constitutes disproportionate force or if it should even be considered wrong. Proportionate force, in theory, should be proportional to the threat. Thus, shooting unarmed thieves by a civilian is considered wrong. Police are accused from time to time of using too much force when taking down criminals.

But no one claims that directly proportionate force should be used by civilians or the authorities. Thieves don't need to be punished by having people steal from them. Rapists aren't raped. Hostage-takers don't have their families taken hostage. No one would logically think that Hamas' rocket fire from Gaza should be countered with equally indiscriminate rocket and mortar fire by Israel.

The history of warfare shows that it has never been fought in a proportionate manner. Winning wars requires not being proportional. Consider World War II. The American army at the end of the war numbered some nine million men under arms. The United States was churning out more planes and tanks in a month in 1944 than the Germans were making in a year. The Soviets massed some 20,000 tanks before the battle of Berlin in 1945.

Other examples: during the first Gulf War, the Americans used disproportionate air power to crush the Iraqi army. In the NATO campaign in Kosovo in 1999, NATO employed more than 1,000 planes against a Serbia that had virtually no air force. When Gen. Ulysses S. Grant brought the full might of the Federal army to bear on the U.S. South in 1864, his soldiers outnumbered Confederate fighters by two to one, and more in almost all battles.

Hardly proportionate.

But it's in law enforcement that we see the greatest use of disproportionate, but necessary, force. One criminal with a handgun can result in the arrival of dozens, if not hundreds, of officers to a crime scene. In a 1997 North Hollywood shootout, two armed bank robbers shooting at police resulted in the arrival of 300 law enforcement officers, 13 of whom were eventually wounded by the robbers.

Disproportionate force is the way crime is prevented and criminals are brought to justice. It's also the way wars are ended. All the great causes of history, such as the abolition of slavery or the desegregation of the American South, were brought about by the use of disproportionate force. (In the latter example, the U.S. National Guard was used to secure rights for black Americans.) Nazism would not have been defeated had the Allies relied on proportionate force. Proportionate force is a recipe for unending war and the endless victimization of civilians at the hands of terrorist aggressors. Fighting crime – as with terror and Nazism – requires disproportionate force.

Opinions

Rabbis for Human Rights deserves support

Those promoting a symbiotic relationship between Israel and the Diaspora argue that each is essential for the other. Israel strengthens Jews throughout the world in their sense of being part of a vibrant and resourceful people that despite constant challenges is a beacon of hope to us all.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

In turn the Diaspora, particularly in western countries, promotes democracy and human rights based on the ethical foundations of Judaism and its stress on responsibility for the other. That's its contribution in the world and its way to help Israel remain a Jewish and a just society.

This was very much in evidence when earlier this month Rabbis for Human Rights in Israel held a conference to celebrate 20 years of existence. Most of those present were born in the Diaspora and trained in the liberal traditions of Reform and Conservative Judaism. Their commitment to Zionism brought them to Israel, but their Jewish outlook has its roots in the Diaspora. They promote the symbiosis.

It's a non-political and interdenominational association that seeks to alert the Israeli public to human rights abuses of its Jewish and Arab citizens, as well as of the rights of Palestinians in the territories. Because it co-operates with other like-minded groups, Jews who espouse right-wing politics are often prone to describe Rabbis for Human Rights as naïve, subversive and working against Jewish interests.

Nothing could be further from the truth. The organization is rooted in the teachings of Judaism that stress the divine imperative of justice and love of neighbour. Much of its work is in the realm of education. However, not to imprison themselves in the ivory tower of self-righteous preaching, members also engage in actions against, say, wanton destruction of Arab homes, abuses of human rights in the territories, discrimination against individuals and groups within Israel and a host of similar injustices.

Its most visible public face is its executive director, Rabbi Arik Ascherman, who with courage and determination has put himself in the firing line of verbal abuse, police action and even military intervention. Knowing full well that a relatively small group of non-militant rabbis, however articulate and well-intentioned, cannot effectively stand up to authority, he's determined to be a witness in the best prophetic tradition. He perceives his work as reflecting the very core of Judaism.

The presence of Rabbis for Human Rights makes a difference in Israel. It reminds the population not only of the teachings of Judaism, but also of the stated intentions of the founders of the Jewish state. It, therefore, pays considerable attention to the study of Israel's Declaration of Independence and its implementation in our time.

Rabbis for Human Rights has earned our unstinting support.

Anti-Israel or anti-education?

With the outbreak of violence in the Gaza Strip, Israel is starting to take heat in the public sphere. Its refusal to accept a hollow peace agreement from a terrorist organization has given it more detractors. And along with the negative press, we are beginning to notice a growing trend that promotes hate toward Zionists, Israelis and the entire Jewish population.

Justin Dahan in Ottawa

In recent years, Canadian university campuses have not been friendly toward Israel, and many have hosted anti-apartheid weeks and been the site of anti-Israel demonstrations. But now CUPE Ontario is going one step further with a proposed a ban on Israeli professors.

Sid Ryan, the union's president, made the following statement earlier this month: "In response to an appeal from the Palestinian Federation of Unions of University Professors and Employees, we are ready to say Israeli academics should not be on our campuses unless they explicitly condemn the university bombing and the assault on Gaza in general."

Ryan made his comments in light of Israel's recent bombing of the Islamic University in Gaza. Israel said Hamas terrorists had been using the university's laboratories for weapons research and to store munitions.

The proposed ban has yet to be drafted, but CUPE's plan is to have it ready for a vote at a February conference. If the vote passes, the only way an Israeli-born academic would be allowed to teach at a university that adheres to the boycott is if he or she denounces Israel's actions in Gaza.

Would it be rational to force an American professor to denounce the occupation of Iraq because groups of people view the Iraq war as wrong? That would never happen in our society.

Protests against Israel are one thing, even when they feature unfavourable and offensive terms such as "apartheid state." But this crosses a line.

This is a clear case of discrimination. CUPE, the largest university workers union, wants universities to decide whom to employ based on political affiliation and birthplace. What happened to freedom of speech? A university is supposed to be a collection of intellectuals presenting opinions. CUPE's proposal runs counter to such an open environment. It is censorship of the highest form. It's also a way to prevent students from learning about Israel from a pro-Israeli viewpoint.

Moreover, in publicly condemning support for Israel, CUPE is supporting opposition to Israel, thus siding with a terrorist organization – Hamas.

It should not come as a shock to anyone to learn that CUPE is hindering education yet again. CUPE local 3903 has been holding York University hostage for most of the academic year with a teaching assistants' strike that has the potential to cancel the entire year for thousands of students.

Perhaps instead of focusing an entire union's efforts on banning Israeli-born professors, CUPE should get back to what's important – namely, education. Playing political games only hurts students. CUPE is denying York students an education, and now it's attempting to prevent qualified professors from working in Ontario.

This clear violation of human rights needs to be quashed before it can be allowed to happen. We can't permit censorship based upon political affiliation with Israel. It is, quite simply, a bigoted policy that should not, and cannot, be accepted.

Bombing Gaza university was a bad idea

Whether you're for the war or against it; whether you think Hamas is a terrorist organization or Israel an occupying power, and whether you see the light of peace at the end of the tunnel or an endless cycle of violence, speak up. Please.

Jesse Mintz in Halifax

Exercise the one measure of control an individual has over a conflict that's so much larger than any one person: express yourself. Talk to anyone who might listen – teachers, parents, children, friends and family – even if they don't agree with you, and especially if they don't agree with you, for it's most often through disagreements that we learn.

Apathy does a great disservice to democracy. So voice an opinion – any opinion – and make yourself heard.

With this in mind, I come to this month's column. As a Jewish student, the conflict in Gaza touches me in much the same way as it does any other Jew in Canada who is removed from the fighting.

We don't need to worry about Qassam rockets hitting our cities or friends and family in the military. We do, however, need to satisfy our consciences – to act according to our own moral compasses in our criticism or support of Israeli measures and, by doing so, act as ambassadors for the Israeli people.

The avenues are plentiful and the debate ongoing, as are the opportunities available to the general public through protests and editorials in newspapers, and to students on politically charged university campuses.

And yet there's one issue that seems to demand students' attention, perhaps more so than the general public's: last month's bombing of the Islamic University in Gaza.

It was targeted in six air attacks, and Israel holds that it was used as a storehouse for Hamas arms. But many analysts, including some writing for Ha'aretz in Israel, dismiss these claims and say the university was bombed as much for its cultural and symbolic association with Hamas as for its military one.

While its political and cultural symbolism has been emphasized in the media, little has been written of its value as an educational institution. Until its evacuation at the outset of the conflict, the university served as the foremost institute for secondary education in Gaza, educating nearly 20,000 students, mostly women. The university has 10 faculties, ranging from art and commerce to information technology and Shariah law, and it confers both bachelor and master's degrees.

Last summer, the closed and limiting world of the Gazan Palestinian became international news for a brief moment as Israel denied exit permits to seven Palestinian students who were awarded Fulbright fellowships by the U.S. State Department to study in the United States. Only after U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice urged the Israeli government to permit the students to leave did Israel do so, although, even then, only four of the seven were allowed passage through the bureaucratic red tape.

Gazans are barred from either entering Israel or crossing into the West Bank to study, further limiting their university access. In light of the restrictions on Gazans' travel – checkpoints and borders impede Palestinian movement at every turn – the already obvious importance of the Islamic University, Gaza's oldest university, becomes magnified.

The language used by newspapers around the world lauding Israel's decision to allow the Fulbright scholars to leave last summer made popular sentiment clear: it was perceived as a victory for both Israeli society and the students involved. Education was recognized as giving students hope for personal betterment while simultaneously stimulating Palestinians to make peace with Israel.

Such sentiment was as true then as it is now. The moral outrage over academic freedom stemming from CUPE Ontario's proposed boycott of Israeli academics earlier this month should with equal and unequivocal weight condemn the destruction of the university in Gaza.

Peace won't be found in the rubble of a former seat of learning. It will be found only in the return of normalcy to the lives of both Gazans and Israelis. The establishment of schools is but one aspect of this, one that will help foster prosperity in Gaza.

An injustice has been perpetrated against Palestinians who depend on the Islamic University for their dreams of social mobility and economic progress. More than this, however, an injustice has been perpetrated against Israelis who, cognizant of the Palestinians' plight, seek to provide equitable terms for peace.

The Kirshner File

George W. Bush's record on Israel

In a year-end piece in the New York Times in 2008, columnist Bob Herbert wrote that the majority of Americans would be glad to say good riddance to the 43rd president of the United States, George W. Bush, who vacated the White House this week after eight years in office and was replaced by the first African-American president, Barack Obama. Blasting Bush's foreign and domestic policies, Herbert observed, "This is the man who gave us the war in Iraq and Guantanamo and torture and rendition; who turned the Clinton economy and the budget surplus into fool's gold; who dithered while New Orleans drowned; who trampled our civil liberties at home and ruined our reputation abroad..."

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

It's clear that Bush left a legacy of anger and distrust, but in Israel he was highly regarded. On Bush's first official visit to Israel last January, the Israeli prime minister, Ehud Olmert, hailed him as Israel's "strongest and most trusted ally." As he put it, "Your policies have reflected a basic understanding of the challenges facing Israel in this troubled region and a solid commitment to our national security."

In a speech to the Knesset during that visit, Bush solidified his reputation as one of the most pro-Israel of presidents. "The alliance between our governments is unbreakable," he declared, saying it is guided by "clear principles and shared convictions" that will not be affected by "popularity polls" or "shifting opinions of international elites." Praising Israel as "a light unto the nations," Bush said that Israel could always count on the United States "to be at your side."

Revisiting Israel several months later during its 60th anniversary celebrations, Bush reiterated America's commitment to the Jewish state, noting the United States was "proud to be Israel's closest ally and best friend."

Not surprisingly, Bush stuck by Israel in his final days as president, as the current war in the Gaza Strip unfolded. His administration accused Hamas of having provoked hostilities by breaking the six-month ceasefire and continuing to fire rockets at Israel, agreed that Israel had acted in self-defence and called for a durable and lasting truce. In yet another demonstration of loyalty, the United States vetoed a one-sided Libyan resolution at the United Nations.

Washington, however, supported a call by the Quartet of Middle East peace brokers – the United States, the United Nations, the European Union and Russia – for an immediate truce and abstained on a resolution, proposed by Britain, France and Arab states and passed by a 14-0 margin, calling for "an immediate, durable and fully respected ceasefire."

The Israeli government was disappointed by Washington's decision not to veto the UN resolution altogether, but Israel could take solace from the fact that the Bush administration had, in effect, given Israel still more time to press its ground invasion of Gaza. Lest it be forgotten, Washington adopted a similar position during the 2006 war in Lebanon, when Israeli forces fought Hezbollah.

Bush, a born-again Christian, was predisposed to Israel from the outset. On his first-ever visit to Israel in 1998, when he was governor of Texas, he was taken on a helicopter ride of the country by the then-foreign minister, Ariel Sharon, who sought to impress upon him that Israel could ill afford to make sweeping geographical concessions to the Palestinians. Bush formed a close bond with Sharon and described him as "a man of peace" after he became Israel's prime minister.

As Bush campaigned for the presidency, he spoke to key members of the American Israel Public Affairs Committee, an influential lobby based in Washington. In comments that would define his attitude to Israel, Bush said that the United States and Israel had "a special friendship" and asserted that his support of Israel was "not conditional on the outcome of the peace process."

Bush, in the aftermath of the Islamist terror attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, placed the Arab-Israeli conflict on the back burner and concentrated on defeating the Taliban and Al Qaeda in Afghanistan. Suggesting that his predecessor, Bill Clinton, had spent too much time trying to forge peace between Israel and the Palestinians and Israel and Syria, Bush refrained from appointing a permanent special envoy to the Middle East.

Instead, following the outbreak of the second Palestinian uprising in 2000, he dispatched two emissaries to the region – George Tenet, the director of the Central Intelligence Agency, and Anthony Zini, a former U.S. general – in what proved to be a futile effort to broker a ceasefire. Yet he did not promote Israeli talks with Syria.

The Bush administration severed relations with the president of the Palestinian Authority, Yasser Arafat, after Israel intercepted the Karine-A, a ship carrying Iranian weapons and munitions to the PA. Like Israel, the United States boycotted Arafat. Nonetheless, Bush's first secretary of state, Colin Powell, criticized Israel for launching raids into Gaza in response to the first Qassam rocket attacks.

Bush and Ehud Olmert in Jerusalem last year

Despite his antipathy to Arafat, Bush was the first American president to explicitly call for a Palestinian state within the framework of a two-state solution. But as he said in a landmark 2002 speech, the Palestinians required a leadership that was "untainted by terrorism." With Arafat's death and his replacement by Mahmoud Abbas, the United States reopened its relationship with the PA and resumed financial aid to the Palestinians.

Bush embraced the 2003 "road map" peace plan, which set out the terms for a resolution of Israel's conflict with the Palestinians. But the initiative crumbled because the United States did not exert sufficient pressure on both sides to fully abide by its conditions.

In 2004, in one of his most significant speeches on the Middle East, Bush tacitly recognized Israel's claim to several settlement blocs in the contested West Bank. As he put it, "In light of new realities on the ground, including already existing major Israeli population centres, it is unrealistic to expect that the outcome of final status negotiations will be a full and complete return to the armistice lines of 1949."

Alongside this statement supporting Israel's refusal to return to the pre-1967 borders, the United States chided Israel for expanding settlements in the territories, building in disputed eastern Jerusalem and tolerating unauthorized outposts. Washington also asked Israel to ease its restrictions on the lives of Palestinian civilians in the territories and advised Israel to build its new separation barrier along the border rather than inside the West Bank. Bush's second secretary of state, Condoleezza Rice, worked to revive the road map. But the 2007 Annapolis agreement turned out to be a dead letter, notwithstanding Olmert's claim that a lot of progress had been made in Israeli-Palestinian talks.

Bush, in keeping with his commitment to maintain Israel's qualitative military edge over the Arab states, approved a $30-billion aid package to Israel over 10 years, allowed Israel to buy state-of-the-art F-35 fighter jets and deployed an advanced radar system in the Negev, manned by American personnel, to guard against a potential missile attack by Iran.

But while Bush pledged that he would never permit Iran to acquire a nuclear arsenal, he declined to sell Israel a new generation of bunker-busting bombs or let Israeli aircraft overfly Iraq in case Israel decided to bomb Iran's nuclear sites.

He portrayed the 2003 U.S. invasion of Iraq as a victory for democracy in the region and as a gift to Israel's security. But given the resultant chaos in Iraq and the empowerment of the Shiite community, Iran has managed to increase its influence in Iraq, a development that Israel views with great concern.

Over 5,000 attend Toronto rally in support of the people of Israel

UJA, partner agencies mobilize community on behalf of Southern Israel

By Barbra Green and Daniel Horowitz

In an overwhelming display of solidarity and pride, the Jewish community of Greater Toronto gathered Thursday, January 8 for a massive rally in support of the people of Israel.

The Rally for the People of Israel and Freedom from Terror was organized by UJA Federation with the support of its partner agencies and dozens of community sponsors.

Braving the bitter cold and traffic-snarled streets, over 5,000 people poured into Beth Tzedec Congregation on Bathurst Street, filling the sanctuary and banquet hall and spilling into overflow rooms equipped with large video screens broadcasting the event. A host of other Jewish communities across Canada – including Montreal, Halifax and Hamilton - gathered for simultaneous rallies, watching the program via closed-circuit television.

"We stand shoulder to shoulder with our brothers and sisters in Israel," said community leader Julia Koschitzky, the evening's emcee, referring specifically to the men, women and children of Sderot and other southern communities, who continue to be victimized by unrelenting Qassam rocket attacks fired by Hamas terrorists. "We understand that Israel had no choice," she said to a rousing ovation, one of many on the night. "There is only so much a people and a land can bear before they reach a breaking point."

The first speaker of the rally was Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl of Beth Tzedec who delivered an impassioned d'var torah. Amir Gissin, the Consul General of Israel to Toronto followed, stressing how important this show of support was to the Jewish state and to "the war over public opinion."

"This war is almost as important as the war on the ground," said Gissin. While he is optimistic that Israel is winning that battle, he encouraged all present at the event and watching from coast to coast, to continue the fight by writing letters to the editor, staying informed and spreading the word.

Arguably, the most enthusiastic response from the audience came during comments from the Honourable Peter Kent, Minister of State Foreign Affairs and MP for Thornhill.

"Tonight, I am here, we are here, to stand with Israel," said Kent to a roaring crowd. "Canada maintains that these rocket attacks are the cause of this current crisis, and we support Israel's right to defend itself against the continued attacks by Hamas."

Kent reiterated the federal government's desire for an enduring and sustainable ceasefire that would allow Israel and her neighbours to live in peace and without fear of attack. His words of understanding and solidarity sent hundreds of Canadian and Israeli flags waving throughout the sanctuary.

Other politicians who attended the rally were The Honourable Joseph Volpe, MP for Eglinton Lawrence; David Zimmer, Parliamentary Assistant to the Attorney General and MPP for Willowdale; Josh Matlow, Toronto District School Board Trustee for St. Paul's; James Pasternak, Toronto District School Board for York Centre and David Cohen, Richmond Hill Councillor.

"Whether we are from Toronto, Hamilton, London, Ottawa, Montreal, Halifax, Winnipeg, Calgary or Vancouver, we want to express our appreciation for the supportive positions adopted by the government of Canada and the liberal opposition," said Koschitzky.

Meanwhile, on the other side of the world, at 3:45 a.m., a live satellite broadcast from Be'er Sheva brought the war home. Together with Yossi Tanuri, Director General, United Israel Appeal Federations Canada (UIAFC), a number of brave and tired Israelis gathered at a school recently bombed by Hamas, to tell their stories and discuss the fear, resilience and harsh realities of life in Israel today.

The new Mayor of Be'er Sheva, Rubik Danilovich, spoke of the incredible spirit and hope expressed by the students who recently visited their damaged classroom. Then there was Yehudit Recanati, who spoke about Natal – a program that funds mobile trauma units throughout Israel to provide much-needed psychological counselling to thousands of citizens. And there was Tamar Ben-Avram, the stoic mother of Raz, a soldier fighting in Gaza, who discussed how life must go on in the face of unrelenting uncertainty and fear.

The broadcast concluded with a surprise pre-recorded video message from Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert who sent his heartfelt thanks to those participating in the rally for "expressing solidarity, especially with the people of Sderot."

The final speaker, former Consul General of Israel in New York, Alon Pinkas, provided valuable insights and analysis of the ongoing conflict. Pinkas placed the war in the broader context of the Middle East as well, stating that "if we defeat Hamas, we inflict defeat on Iran," since they share the same fundamentalist, intolerant, anti-democratic ideology. He predicted that a resolution to the conflict will happen within six weeks of United States President-elect Barack Obama taking office and reiterated that Israel has no desire to re-occupy Gaza.

"At the end of all of this there will have to be a political process, not with Hamas, but with the Palestinians," said Pinkas. "We are going to have to find a way to coexist; otherwise we are doomed for another 100 years."

"This rally showed Jewish Toronto's true ruach and passion for Israel and its people," said UJA President and CEO, Ted Sokolsky. "More than 5,000 Canadians came out to show their support for the Jewish State and to say to terrorists that 'enough is enough'. Imagine having to endure eight years of unrelenting rocket attacks; rockets falling in your backyard or through the roof of your house, when all you're doing is just trying to live your life, and raise your family. Finally, Israel reached a breaking point, a breaking point where its citizens can no longer live under these conditions. Rallies across Canada and around the world help get that message across, a message of hope for the rights of all citizens to live their lives free from the scourge of terrorism."

Over 5,000 people participated in the recent Rally for the People of Israel, held at Toronto's Beth Tzedec Congregation. The overflow crowd took part in the rally from special rooms set up in the shul, equipped with audio and video capabilities.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Pray for the soldiers of the IDF

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

At this time, it's impossible to think about much else but Israel. It's my fervent prayer that by the time these words go to print, their contents will no longer be applicable, that the mission in Gaza will have already been concluded successfully and will have put down – for now, if not permanently – the terrorism emanating from Gaza.

Through A Sephardi Window

The following is part of an address (taken from notes) made during the Yom Kippur War in 1973 in the Mirrer Yeshiva in Jerusalem by the then rosh yeshiva, the late Rabbi Chaim Shmuelevitz.

"The Babylonian Talmud, in Bava Batra (10b) makes a passing, almost cryptic mention of 'the martyrs of Lod.' Of them, and in particular of their station in the world to come, the Talmud states, 'No creature is able to stand in their place.' Who were these martyrs of Lod and what did they do to merit such a statement, placing them in rarefied and highest echelon of the heavens?

"Their time in history was a difficult one, when Israel found itself under the Roman commonwealth. The leadership then was under the infamous and evil Turnus Rufus. Apparently, his daughter, missing for some time, had just been found murdered. The incensed Turnus Rufus quickly and conveniently concluded that the blame for this crime rested none other than with the Jews, in particular those living in the vicinity of Lod.

"A standing army soon stood in siege around the city waiting for the orders to avenge her death. They were ready to utterly destroy Lod and all of its innocent, but ill-fated inhabitants. All that would be gained by this senseless slaughter was that the rage of a madman would perhaps be somewhat abated. Just then, two young men, brothers Louliannus and Papus, stood up to profess their guilt and to turn themselves in.

"The mad totality of Turnus Rufus' livid fury was quickly unleashed on these two hapless souls. They were tortured by means beyond comprehension or human imagination, until such point in time that death itself was merciful. Louliannus and Papus were, of course, wholly innocent and in no way implicated in the murder of Turnus Rufus' daughter. Their only motive in making themselves scapegoats was to protect the poor people of Lod from the madness of Turnus Rufus. For their ultimate and selfless sacrifice, the Talmud testifies that 'of their station in the world to come, no creature is able to stand in their place.'"

From this episode, Rabbi Shmuelevitz concluded that if this was the reward for those who protects others, that is how we should view the soldiers of the Israel Defence Forces, who go to battle and place their lives on the line to defend our people in Israel. He continued by imploring his listeners that it's a responsibility of the highest order to offer our many and heartfelt prayers on behalf of the soldiers of the IDF, prayers for quick and decisive success in their mission, that they should be returned soon to their homes, to their mothers and fathers safely, and that they do so alive and in full health.

Modern media open a new frontier

With the exception of a smattering of letters to the editor, newspapers are media 1.0 – one-way media. The journalist writes, the reader reads and, on occasion, may comment on the article around the water cooler or at the dinner table. That's where the conversation usually ends.

Class Act
By Daniel Held

Notwithstanding the scores of e-mails I've received in the last few weeks asking me to write letters to the editor commenting on the war in Gaza, these letters are rarely written. In the event that a letter is printed, the time lag between the publication of the original article and your comments often dulls the point of the argument.

For my generation, the media battle surrounding the war in Gaza has left the newspaper behind and moved to more fertile pasture.

Enter media 2.0. This form of media is international, instant and interactive.

Search for Israel on YouTube and you will find more than 200,000 videos. The top hit, Let's Play Pretend, originates from Israel, was uploaded 10 days ago and has already had over 100,000 views. With the click of a button I can e-mail it, embed it on my own website, share it through Facebook or MySpace. The video has garnered hundreds of text comments and even video responses – each of which is public, expresses a strong opinion, and was published instantly – a far cry from the letter to the editor.

The Israel Defence Forces recently created its own YouTube channel offering videos directly from the front, regular updates from IDF spokespeople and a history of the situation in Gaza. These videos have received hundreds of thousands of views from around the world, bringing information, for the first time, directly from the IDF to the public. Bypassing the reporter, the IDF is able to offer its message without the added lense of a journalist.

Reading the news has also changed. Google News automatically searches 4,500 news sources simultaneously. Type in Gaza, and over 20,000 articles appear from media outlets in Texas and Taiwan, the United Kingdom and the United Arab Emirates. The breadth of perspectives is a far cry from the days of having one newspaper delivered to my home each morning.

In an attempt to reach out to Media 2.0, the Israeli Consulate in New York recently held its first Twitter news conference. Twitter is an online service that allows people to communicate, in 140 characters or fewer, what they are doing, thinking, etc. In the news conference, twitterers from around the world asked short, but poignant, questions of the Israeli consul, who answered in "Internet speak," using abbreviations and slang.

In the last two weeks, the Israeli Consulate has posted nearly 200 updates on the war, the situation in Israel and even the safety of Birthright Israel participants. Over 4,000 people subscribe to the consulate's feed, instantly receiving every update.

With media 2.0, reading and responding to Israel's war in Gaza has changed. News is immediate, comes from multiple sources, and is interactive. Using YouTube, Twitter and other outlets, Israel has led the way to advocacy over Media 2.0, but it is not enough.

The key to this new media lies in its democratic nature and its viral spread. Anyone can post anything. There is no longer an editor to select which letters to publish. Rather, in the world of Media 2.0 any voice that wants to be heard, can be heard. And it spreads. In seconds, thousands of e-mails, links and twitters can spread the word about any survey, video or article.

If, on the PR front, Israel's wars are won and lost in the media, Media 2.0 has opened a new frontier in the battle, requiring a new generation of strategies and soldiers.

Religious feminism

New Jewish Feminism – Probing the Past, Forging the Future. Edited by Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, Jewish Lights Publishing.

In this provocative and timely book, 37 feminists: rabbis, cantors, scholars, congregational leaders as well as chaplains from the United States, Canada and Israel address the varied and complex issues that confront Jewish women.

The authors of the articles reflect the views of the Reform, Conservative, Orthodox, Reconstructionist and Jewish Renewal movements.

In her foreword to the volume, Anita Diamant (well-known as the author of The Red Tent) indicates that this is the first time in Jewish history that women's voices have been added to the public discourse about everything: about God and Halachah, about the governance of our synagogues, about marriage and how we educate our children, about our money, about the substance and fire of our lives.

For Diamant, feminism is nothing less than a profound expression of Judaism's mission and part of the Torah's mandate for justice and the sanctification of life.

The book organizes its material into seven main areas: theology; ritual and Torah study; the synagogue; Israel; gender, sexuality and age; the denominations; and leadership and social justice.

It wasn't until 1972 that the Reform movement ordained the first female rabbi. The Conservative and Reconstructionist movements eventually followed suit. But the response of Orthodoxy has been more cautious and much slower.

Sara Hurwitz who serves as religious mentor in an Orthodox synagogue, writes, "There is no doubt that the advent of women in rabbinic positions has already [caused] and is likely to continue to cause a stir within the Orthodox community. Some even suggest that it will cause a major split in the Orthodox movement. If this were to happen, I believe that the modern Orthodox movement would be making great strides to sustain itself as a distinct and vibrant movement."

One widespread concern about the growth and influence of religious feminism is that many male congregants prefer not to attend services led by women. Liberal synagogues have experienced a growing phenomenon of some men simply not showing up.

A review of enrolment figures for Hebrew Union College – Jewish Institute of Religion, the Reform rabbinical seminary, indicates the ratio of female-to-male first-year rabbinic students is now approaching 70 percent women to 30 percent men. The figure of 80 percent female and 20 percent male is often quoted when it come to the expected attendee demographics at a local temple adult education program. Although the synagogue used to be dominated by men and reinforced patriarchal authority, in liberal circles, it is now often characterized by men's absence. Whether this problem will grow or become less acute in the future, as women's role in synagogue life becomes more normative and as younger congregants engage in synagogue practice, remains an unresolved question.

This broad-ranging compendium is edited by Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, director of Kolel: the Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning in Toronto. She is also the editor of several other volumes dealing with feminism and the Jewish tradition and a CJN columnist.

In her introduction, she emphasizes that the book is meant to spur discussion, intended to open up a dialogue between the early Jewish feminist pioneers and the young women shaping Judaism today.

Well-planned, readable and informative, this multi-voiced collection should be read by everyone concerned with Jewish life, the changes it is undergoing and how it will be practised by both men and women in the future.

Google Maps' eye on Israel

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Anyone watching television coverage of the conflict in Gaza and southern Israel will be struck by the high quality graphics and, in particular, the detailed satellite maps of the region. This may come as a bit of a surprise because just a few years ago, online users of Google Maps became accustomed to seeing crisp aerial shots of many inhabited regions of the world – but not Israel. And the accepted reason: sharp photos of sensitive military sites would assist Israel's enemies.

At the time, the Internet was rife with theories about who was responsible – or to blame – for the fuzzy photos: Google or the Israeli military or the American government. Nowadays, the images are clearer, and some people are concerned.

If you're not familiar with these maps, here's a short primer. Google actually provides two map display products, both free. Google Maps is web-based – type in an address or city or landmark and you are immediately presented with a map of the region. Click on a tab and you are presented with a satellite perspective that you can zoom in on to allow remarkable clarity. [maps.google.com] Google Earth is similar, but as a downloadable program it offers even more powerful tools displayed on a virtual globe. [earth.google.com] Both can be incredibly handy when you're looking for an address or planning a trip.

So what kind of risk do they pose, if any? Jerusalem-based blogger Charles Levinson has reproduced aerial shots of the Dimona nuclear reactor freely available via Google. He then quotes Yediot Aharonot's Alex Fishman. "The State of Israel, with its sensitive installations, has lost another scarf veiling its charms. If up until now we were undressed only by the superpower satellites, then now, with the improvement in the quality of satellite images from Google Earth, Israel's most secret spots are becoming visible not only to any ephemeral intelligence organization – but to any Internet surfer." [tinyurl.com/googmap 03]

In a fascinating October 2007 print and video report from the Guardian, reporter Clancy Chassay accompanied Palestinian militants as they fired a rocket from Gaza into southern Israel. When Chassay returned with them to their headquarters, the group's commander in Gaza, Khaled Jaabari, told him, "We obtain the details from Google Earth and check them against our maps of the city centre and sensitive areas." Jaabari then showed Chassay how he used an aerial image of Sderot to search for targets. [tinyurl.com/googmap07]

Around the same time, the San Francisco Chronicle quoted one expert who said these new images do not endanger Israel's security. "Israel has had 10 years to prepare for this," said Prof. Gerald Steinberg of Bar Ilan University and a CJN columnist, who helped draft an agreement with the United States limiting satellite resolution imagery. "They are not real-time pictures, and they were not taken yesterday. I don't think this is a major change in security." [tinyurl.com/googmap09]

One of the best articles I've read on this controversy was written by David Shamah in the Jerusalem Post. In Security & Secrets at Google, Shamah suggested that Google's improved images still don't match those provided for other countries. Aside from that, they are a couple of years old, and "one would also imagine that terrorists interested in such high-resolution images of Israel's strategic sites would have already procured a copy of these detailed, 'top-secret' images long before the less-sophisticated versions of them made it to Google Earth." [tinyurl.com/googmap10]

Concerns about Google maps and security aren't limited to Israel. The New York Times recently reported that "Mumbai terrorists relied on new technology for attacks [and] recognized their targets and knew the most direct routes to reach them in part because they had studied satellite photos from Google Earth." [tinyurl.com/googmap04] A case has been launched in a Mumbai court to compel Google to blur sensitive areas in that country. [tinyurl.com/googmap05]

If you want to see what Google does blur or blot out around the world, the relevant Wikipedia entry lists everything from the Oconee Nuclear Station in South Carolina to Soestdijk Palace, residence of the Dutch Royal Family. [tinyurl.com/googmap08] The list does not currently include any blurred sites in Israel or the Middle East.

המלחמה הזאת

הרב עמוס נתנאל

"אנחנו אוהבים אתכם ומחבקים אתכם. אתם עושים ימים כלילות מתוך גבורה ומסירות למען העם והארץ. אני מדבר בשמי, בשם מלכי, אמו של יוני, בשם צינה אשתו, מעיין הקטנה בת שלושת החודשים ובשם האחים יצחק, שרי ודוד. הפגיעה מאש כוחותינו היא חלק בלתי נפרד מכל מלחמות ישראל ומהיכולת שלנו להכריע את שדה הקרב. יוני יצא למלחמה הזאת, ואנחנו כהורים שלחנו אותו לקרבות האלה. לא אתם פגעתם ביוני."

בעשותו כך החזיר הרב נתנאל חיים לאנשי צוות הטנק, ובכך הפך את הדבר הנורא ביותר שקרה לו למקור אנרגיה חיובית. אינני יכול להעלות בדעתי מעשה יותר נשגב.

גולדה מאיר

בימים אלה, בהם מנסים אנשי התאמאס לפגוע באוכלוסיה האזרחית בישראל, בעוד שצה"ל עושה הכל כדי לא לפגוע באוכלוסיה אזרחית בעזה, בימים שבהם התאמאס מתחבא בבתי ספר ובין משפחות פלסטינאיות-מהדהדות מילות החכמה של גולדה מאיר:

"אנחנו יכולים אולי לסלוח לערבים על שהרגו בילדינו, אך איננו יכולים לסלוח להם על שהם נורמים לנו להרוג את ילדיהם. יהיה שלום עם הערבים רק כשהם ילמדו לאהוב את ילדיהם יותר מאשר הם שונאים אותנו."

אני מציע-לכולנו לצטט משפט זה באויר כל גוי שמדבר איתנו על המלחמה בעזה.

ואלס עם באשיר

Cancellation of CAJE conference saddens educators

U.S. organization is downsizing

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Seymour Epstein, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's senior vice-president for education, was saddened along with other Canadian educators to hear that a major Jewish educational organization is cancelling its annual conference and significantly downsizing.

CAJE, the Coalition for the Advancement of Jewish Education, is cancelling its annual conference because of ongoing financial difficulties, the organization announced earlier this month.

The conference has been the central professional development resource for supplementary and Hebrew school teachers since CAJE was founded 33 years ago.

The federation's Centre for Enhancement of Jewish Education, headed by Epstein, offers training for Jewish educators in Toronto, but "we couldn't ever replace CAJE," said Epstein, a founder of the New York City-based organization.

Lee-Ron Shulman – who is involved in both formal and informal education as a teacher at Associated Hebrew Schools and as youth director at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation – said the recent development is "the loss of more than just another conference," because CAJE brought together educators from all sectors and denominations of the Jewish community "in a safe and caring atmosphere."

In 2007, there were 10 Canadians among approximately 1,200 participants at the conference.

At the time, Anne Andrew, principal of the religious school at Vancouver's Temple Sholom, told The CJN that she had attended almost a dozen CAJE conferences to connect with educators from across North America.

Although she did not attend last summer's conference, one of her teachers participated.

"I feel one educator from each supplementary school should go," Andrew said. "We're going to miss it tremendously. We really relied on it for boosts of energy and enthusiasm every summer."

Epstein, who attended last summer's conference in Burlington, Vt., noted that relatively few Canadians were there, particularly among day school educators. CAJE "primarily deals with supplementary education," he noted.

However, those who attended "always benefitted," both from the "rich content" and the context of spending several days with such a large group of Jewish educators, Epstein added.

After much speculation over its future, CAJE's executive director, Jeffrey Lasday, made the announcement Jan. 9 in a mass e-mail message.

"As you are aware, this is a very difficult time for Jewish not-for-profit agencies in general and it is also an especially tough time for us at CAJE," Lasday wrote. "Due to the current dramatic economic downturn coupled with the financial constraints faced by our members' organizations, congregations and schools, the CAJE leadership has had to face the inescapable conclusion that CAJE can no longer offer our distinctive services to the field, and that we will be unable to convene the CAJE conference in 2009."

Seymour Epstein

Organizing the conference, which was set to take place in San Antonio this summer, has been the organization's primary function, and as a result CAJE will also need to fire significant staff, Lasday wrote. Last year its conference drew some 1,500 Jewish educators.

Already CAJE has laid off the director of the conference, David Frank, and its director of development, Mimi Mark.

The organization is now in discussions with the Jewish Education Service of North America about filling the vacuum in professional services left by CAJE's downsizing.

Israel's case has been fairly presented

"Israel's diplomats know that if journalists are given a choice between covering death and covering context, death wins."

That was the harsh but coldly realistic assessment of New York Times reporter Ethan Bronner, writing about the Israeli government's refusal to allow foreign reporters into Gaza ("Israel Keeping Reporters From Close Look at War," Jan. 7.)

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Bronner wrote: " Israelis say the war is being reduced on television screens around the world to a simplistic story: an American-backed country with awesome military machine fighting a third-world guerrilla force leading to a handful of Israelis dead versus 600 Gazans dead.

"Israelis and their supporters think that such quick descriptions fail to explain the vital context of what has been happening – years of terrorist rocket fire on civilians have gone largely unanswered, and a message had to be sent to Israel's enemies that this would go on no longer, they say. The issue of proportionality, they add, is a false construct, because comparing death tolls offers no help in measuring justice and legitimacy."

So the government made the decision, wrote Bonner, "to keep the news media far away from the death."

As many analysts have pointed out, Hamas is using its people as human shields, increasing the civilian death toll as part of its propaganda war against Israel. Hamas provides no shelters for Palestinian civilians. Many of the images coming out of Gaza are of heart-rending civilian casualties – often children. These are being supplied by Arab media intent on making Israel look as wantonly brutal as possible.

But despite these negative factors, Israel has found support in Canadian newspaper editorials and opinion pieces, and on radio interview shows.

On CBC Radio's Sunday Edition (Jan. 11), Israeli writer Yossi Klein Halevi explained at length and with great passion to host Michael Enright the terrible dilemma that Israel faces fighting Hamas, a fanatical Islamist organization whose dedicated goal is the destruction of Israel, no matter what the cost to its own civilians.

Klein Halevi also provided wider regional analysis in the Globe and Mail ("Clock's ticking toward an Iranian bomb," Jan. 10.) He explained that Hamas in Gaza, like Hezbollah in Lebanon, is acting as a beachhead for its sponsor, Iran.

Klein Halevi pointed out that Iran's quest for nuclear arms has made for new – and surprising – Middle East allies: "Shared dread of a nuclear Iran has helped create the first tacit alliance between Israel and Sunni Arab states. So desperate are some Arab leaders to forestall an Iranian bomb that they have, in effect, sided with Israel against Iran's proxies in the Arab world."

Editorials in Canada's leading newspapers have almost uniformly, and often eloquently, underscored the basic principles of this conflict: Israel has the right, under international law, to defend itself against Hamas' aggression.

For example, the Jan. 6 Globe and Mail lead editorial, "Measured action on the ground," noted the predicament facing Israel: "It is true that many more Palestinian than Israeli civilians have been killed in the current conflict. But the government of Israel, like that of any other nation-state, is answerable above all for the safety of its own people; it cannot acquiesce in violent deaths by rocket attack. By such an invasion, the [Israel Defence Forces] can greatly diminish the number of such killings, but cannot prevent them all."

Most recent (as of this writing) was the Jan. 10 National Post editorial "Moral Clarity on the Middle East." The Post commended Liberal party leader Michael Ignatieff and Peter Kent, minister of state for foreign affairs, for acknowledging that "Israel is justified in its campaign to defend itself from Hamas rocket attacks."

This column cannot begin to cite all of the positive editorials and opinion pieces in the Canadian media, as well as the numerous quotes from Israeli officials and analysts in news stories. To be sure, the Palestinian side has been amply presented throughout, and in ways – with emotion-laden imagery on TV – that might seem overwhelming.

Still, overall, Israel's case has been covered fairly.

Economics major founds an employment service for arts grads

By RIVA GOLD
Special to The CJN

After dozens of papers, scores of sleepless nights and countless cups of coffee, thousands of students graduate with bachelor of arts degrees every year. For many of them, their job prospects are less than ideal.

As someone who recently faced this reality, Lauren Friese founded TalentEgg, a service that matches up recent arts graduates with meaningful entry-level positions. "We basically provide the services a campus career fair used to," the 25-year-old says.

"My arts degree was kind of a hard sell," says Friese, who completed her degree in economics from Queen's University in 2005. "When I graduated, I really didn't know how to get into the workforce."

"Many companies look for specific educational backgrounds, but the fact is, a large majority of students study things like history or politics. It's hard for employers to see how degrees like that translate into actual jobs."

Friese considers herself a huge advocate for the value of an arts degree.

"There is a massive group of students ignored in the recruitment of entry-level talent," she says. For her, arts degrees promote crucial "soft skills," including information dissection, problem solving, meeting deadlines and time management.

"Any program at an accredited university offers a certain standard of teaching and has certain expectations of their students. What you prove in university is your aptitude – it doesn't matter what specifically you studied," she adds.

After her undergraduate degree, Friese decided to pursue a master's degree from London School of Economics (LSE) in economic history. At the school, Friese networked with her international peers and soon after landed a rewarding entry-level position.

"In London, there were several websites to help students transition from school to work. I used one successfully to find a job in a small consulting firm," she says.

Jennifer Swales, left, and Cassandra Jowett, two TalentEgg summer interns, sit in their office known as the "Egg Carton."

"When I moved back to Canada, I found that there really wasn't a resource like that here. We're way behind."

Friese had always been a self-proclaimed "Internet geek," with an interest in web trends. "I saw a system that worked so well in the U.K. that it was obvious I'd have to do that here," she says.

In April, she started TalentEgg to mirror the job-finding programs that worked for her in the United Kingdom. The company works exclusively with arts graduates and employers to find suitable matches, free of charge.

TalentEgg also educates employers about how to recruit suitable applicants.

"Canadian employers put too much emphasis on recruitment through job fairs or connections. Students aren't looking there. A lot of bright, talented students are just going online," she says.

Friese and her co-workers also work with recent graduates, and encourage them to think of job interviews as sales jobs.

"The interview is like selling yourself as a product – your human resource talents, your drive. Focus on how your background benefits the workplace," Friese says.

"Your resumé can't just be a list, either. Make it a sales document emphasizing the benefits you can bring to the job. You really have to paint a picture for them.

"The key is not to draw lines between your prior experience in academia and the job at hand. What you actually want to do is just promote your core skills," she says.

For Friese, she learned to stop focussing on what she learned while working at the clothing store the Gap and instead explained that she worked at the Gap so that she could afford to study at LSE.

Another important piece of advice: students should network before they graduate, she says.

"Anyone who has signalled to the world they want do something in university ends up in something interesting and challenging."

"In my Queen's bubble, everyone brought something to the table. Surround yourself with good people."

Running TalentEgg has been challenging for Friese, who has no formal background in business.

"I read a lot of books on marketing and sales, and online tutorials about how to do my accounting," she says. "Business tactics can be learned, though, but being driven and persistent is what you really need to make things work."

As a former arts student, Friese uses her lack of business training to her advantage.

"I think it allows me to come up with more creative ways to solve problems. On the other hand, I also just surround myself with fantastic people that have lots of experience," she says.

Lauren Friese considers herself an advocate for the value of an arts degree and works to match recent arts grads with good jobs.

So far, TalentEgg has worked with close to 4,000 students and more than 100 employers.

Aside from her business, Friese also speaks at career events and writes articles about soft skills and recruiting. She sits on the board of the Ryerson University liberal arts program and is involved with a "women in IT" group.

Speaking to large audiences, Friese often draws upon her own experiences.

A few weeks ago, she spoke at the annual Conference Board of Canada about the role of Generation Y in the coming years. She highlighted the importance of hiring arts graduates in light of the looming baby boom retirement.

"While the economy is going badly right now, there is still a big baby boom retirement coming up, and those that haven't planned are facing up to 50 per cent of their staff retiring over the next five years," she says.

"Hiring someone who is ambitious and new is a great way to bring in someone inexpensive to fill in those gaps quickly."

For Friese, arts students are particularly suited to fit that mould.

"Arts students are often better, because they're cheaper and more adaptable... They're often better at learning, because that's what they're taught at school," she says.

Tall Tutsis marked for death, Rwanda survivor says

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — In the Nazi worldview, it was a crime, punishable by death, to be Jewish. In the 1994 Rwandan genocide, being a Tutsi was a death sentence.

However, some Tutsis survived because of their short stature. The Hutu militia often determined if someone was a Tutsi, who tend to be tall, by his or her height.

"Twelve times, my mother was taken to the site of a mass grave to be murdered," said Eloge Christian Butera, a Tutsi who spoke to a full house at Winnipeg's Asper Jewish Community Campus on Jan. 8.

"Each time, she was spared because the murderers thought that she was too short to be a Tutsi."

Butera is one of the lucky ones. Not only did he survive the Rwandan genocide in 1994, which claimed close to one million, mainly Tutsi victims, but most of his immediate family, with the exception of his father, also survived.

The McGill University second-year law student was the keynote speaker at "Voices of Victims, Generations of Genocide," a program presented by the Jewish Students' Association/Hillel and National Jewish Campus Life, as well as several other university student associations and anti-genocide groups.

The evening began with the performance of a song written by Winnipeg composer Zane Zalis for his new Holocaust oratorio, which the Winnipeg Symphony Orchestra is set to première in March. The song was sung by students from Miles Macdonell Collegiate.

The audience watched a moving interview with Gen. Roméo Dallaire, the Canadian commander of the UN Mission in Rwanda during the 100-day mass slaughter of Tutsi and moderate Hutu citizens. Dallaire, who is now a senator, said his small force received little support from the United Nations, adding that every United Nations member country approached for help would not do so.

Butera said that it was good to be in Winnipeg, where he first lived and attended university after coming to Canada in 2002.

"My purpose in sharing my personal, painful experiences is to try to strengthen your resolve to speak out against genocide and human rights abuses wherever they occur and not let them go unnoticed," he told his audience of largely university students.

Butera, originally from a small town in northeastern Rwanda, said his father was a doctor and his mother was a public servant.

"Because we were Tutsi, my father was not allowed to have tenure in the hospitals where he worked," he recalled. "You had to be of the right ethnic background. Therefore, we had to move every couple of years."

As a child, unaware of the situation, Butera thought that moving frequently was fun. The discrimination against Tutsis hit home for him in Grade 2, when a teacher demanded that he and four other Tutsis in his class stand up and then proceeded to berate them for all the ills in Rwanda. This became a regular occurrence throughout his school years.

April 7, 1994, is a day that Butera will always remember. He and his family were woken by their servant, who told them that family members had been murdered nearby and the killers were coming for them. They had 15 minutes to flee into the bush.

"The killers couldn't find us, so they killed our dog," Butera recalled.

The Butera family joined hundreds of other Tutsis fleeing south. The mass of refugees was stopped at a roadblock. His father was murdered. Most of the rest of the Tutsis fled into a school, but only 12 survived the subsequent attack on the school. Butera and his younger brother froze when they saw their father being killed and didn't go into the school. Instead, they ended up finding shelter in the home of a Hutu family, who had been friends of his parents.

Then Butera's mother decided to take her chances and go home. She left her young daughter with a friendly neighbour. Butera's mother managed to survive in hiding until the orgy of killing was brought to an end by an invading Tutsi army.

"Genocide doesn't end when the killing stops," Butera said. "For the survivors, there is trauma, painful memories and disease. And thousands of Tutsi women were raped."

He said that after the killings, his mother established a charity in Rwanda dedicated to helping other female survivors of the genocide who lost family and/or were raped.

"My mother is an inspiration to me," he said.

Half the money raised during the evening was donated to the charity.

"When children are being murdered on the other side of the world, what is our responsibility?" he asked. "It is hard to believe that men can commit genocide. Often, we have tried to fool ourselves into believing that it can't be happening."

He called on the members of his audience to "name and shame" the killers in the Congo (where, he reported, 600 people have been murdered since Christmas), the enablers of Darfur, the occupiers of Tibet and murderous tyrants everywhere.

Despite his experiences and what he sees going on around the world, Butera said that he remains hopeful – and especially hopeful that Barack Obama's election as president of the United States heralds a positive new beginning for the world.

Montreal leaders dive for cover during Israel visit

Red alert goes off during trek from Sderot

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Leaders of Federation CJA visiting areas of southern Israel within range of Hamas rockets got a taste of what life is like for people living there.

Last Friday, while driving from Sderot, a town near the Gaza border, to Be'er Sheva in the Negev, a Red Dawn alert went off.

Federation president Marc Gold wrote on his blog that the van they were travelling in quickly pulled onto the shoulder of the highway.

"We rushed out and lay down in a ditch by the side of the road. It is hard to describe the feelings that run through you as you wait for the sound of the missile to explode, a mixture of faith, resignation and helplessness," he wrote.

"This time the rocket must have fallen far from us because we didn't hear any boom."

Gold, along with this year's Combined Jewish Appeal general chair Ian Karper, Sephardi campaign chair Moise Amselem, and David Cape, chair of the federation's Israel and Overseas Department, arrived in Israel last Thursday for a three-day visit. The purpose was to show solidarity with Israel during the current conflict.

Just after landing, they heard that two Hamas missiles had fallen on Be'er Sheva, injuring eight people.

"We got on our phones and BlackBerries to make sure our friends were safe, and were relieved to hear that they were," Gold wrote.

"But it serves as a sad and sobering reminder of what life is like for those living under the constant threat of rocket fire."

Marc Gold

The Montreal Jewish community has been twinned with Be'er Sheva under a United Israel Appeal program for many years, and CJA funds a number of facilities and services there aimed at improving the quality of life.

Earlier on Friday, the Montrealers visited a playground in Sderot, where bomb shelters are as common a sight as swings and slides.

It dawned on Gold that, with Sderot enduring shelling from Gaza for eight years, young children have never known any other reality than running for cover every time an alert is sounded.

They also witnessed children in a school attending a session with a trauma therapist, which has become a regular part of the curriculum to help the kids deal with stress.

Then Gold and the others met with Israeli soldiers in the Shaare Negev region near Gaza. They gave them gifts of socks and letters of support written by grade 5 and 6 students at Akiva School.

"The soldiers were really moved by their letters, as indeed we all were as well."

The federation has established a relief fund for southern Israel, and hopes to raise $1 million for such projects as day trips out of harm's way for 4,000 children and setting up a trauma centre at a teachers' college in Be'er Sheva in order to free up beds at Sroka Hospital for those wounded in the fighting.

Meanwhile, the United Community of Russian-Speaking Jews of Quebec issued its own statement in support of Israel's armed offensive against Hamas, which the group blames for the conflict.

"Each and every innocent death is a real tragedy. We are sorry when any child cries, no matter Jewish or Arabic. We deeply sympathize with the Palestinian mothers who lose their children, but the cup of grief and suffering of the Israeli mothers is already over-filled," it reads.

The group's president Mark Groysberg said there are 20,000 Russian-speaking Jews in the province, according to information he obtained from Statistics Canada.

Jews must continue to work to ensure 'Never Again'

By JOSH SCHEINERT

The history of genocide is a Jewish one in every sense of the word. The Holocaust was a seminal event in modern history that made the world confront its horror.

Less known, however, is the story of Raphael Lemkin, the Polish-Jewish lawyer and anti-genocide crusader. The term genocide never existed until it was coined by Lemkin, who managed to escape the Holocaust to America. He created the word by combining geno, the Greek word for race, and cide, the Latin word for killing. His efforts led to the 1948 Genocide Convention, making the act of genocide illegal, everywhere.

Lemkin's crusade was an effort to make sure that the Holocaust was the last genocide. To use Elie Weisel's phrase, it was, "So that my past does not have to be someone's future."

Oh, how we have failed them.

Genocide is the world's problem. No nation or people can turn away from it. But more so than for anyone else, genocide is a problem for Jews.

We bear the unfortunate burden of being the reason for the vow "Never again." With that burden comes a responsibility that we will never, like it or not, be able to shake. If there is genocide in the world, Jewish communities everywhere must be up in arms, working tirelessly to do what very few were willing to do for us.

Our track record so far is less than laudable. We failed in Cambodia, and two million people died. In Srebenica, we failed as 8,000 Bosnian Muslim boys and men were murdered in a United Nations safe zone. The death of 800,000 Rwandan Tutsis was another mark of shame upon our vow.

What would Lemkin say? What would our relatives, looking down on us, say?

Yes, you can say that Jews aren't the only ones who failed, and that would be true. But politics cannot factor into our excuses and cloud our morality. We've been cast in our role more firmly than others – not only is it moral, it's personal.

Jan. 27 is International Holocaust Remembrance Day. Jews and non-Jews around the world are supposed to gather and remember. We will recall how the world stood idly by as our parents and grandparents were gassed. In the end, we will have a moment of silence and vow the hypocritical vow, "Never again."

Just a few days later, in February, the world will mark the start of the sixth year of genocide in Sudan's Darfur region, making it, in length, a longer genocide than the Holocaust. And "Never again" will cement its transition to "Ever again."

How much longer does Darfur have to suffer before we get the electric shock needed to jolt us into action? I wrote a piece in this paper three years ago on this very subject. In an attempt to highlight the need for Jewish leadership on Darfur, I recalled the verse in Isaiah that says Jews must be a light unto the nations.

Lemkin helped brighten that light. We have played a role in extinguishing it.

Darfur's genocide has been happening for longer than the Holocaust – let me say it again: longer than the Holocaust – and it's been going on right before our eyes. The region is filled with harrowing tales of mass murder, rape and destruction that have targeted three ethnic groups – the Fur, Masalit and Zaghawa. The number of victims is still growing.

Where are our rabbis crying out from our bimot? Why are our community federations, schools and agencies not sounding the alarm bells, organizing and rallying? Until our reaction stops being one of business as usual, with an occasional mention in a sermon or at a fundraising table, we will continue to fail as a community.

I don't want to be completely negative. I know we care and that there have been a few initiatives for Darfur that originated in our community.

Yet, until it can be asserted that efforts from Canada's Jews have translated into measurable improvement in the lives of Darfuris and helped accelerate and boost the inadequate efforts by our government to end the genocide, we have not done enough. Taking minimal action to placate our collective guilt as a community of genocide survivors is of no comfort to those in Darfur who are praying that they, too, will be a genocide survivor instead of a statistic.

There is a lot we can do, and I could list those things here. But first, before we even get to that stage, we have to want to do something. In six years of Darfur's genocide, we have not shown that we do.

In the Majdanek concentration camp there is a giant dome. Underneath it, in plain sight, are the ashes of tens of thousands of Jews. On top of the dome, there is an inscription that reads: "Let our fate be a warning to you."

For the past six years, we have squandered their warning. Oh, how we have failed them.

Josh Scheinert is a student at Osgoode Hall Law School and a past advocacy director of STAND Canada (Students Taking Action Now Darfur). To learn how you can help Darfur, visit www.standcanada.org, www.sdcanada.org and www.savedarfur.org.

At a Toronto rally in 2006 the public spoke up against genocide in Darfur.

In cjnews.com this week

When Zac Kaye, Hillel of Greater Toronto's executive director, accepted a job as a Hillel professional at the University of New South Wales in Australia, he never imagined that 25 years later, he would receive a lifetime achievement award for a quarter century of service to the Jewish student community.

Food trends to watch out for in 2009

Lisa Weinberg

Q. With the new year underway, I am wondering what new food trends you see emerging.

A. I do see some new trends unique to 2009, as well as a continuation of some of last year's trends.

The biggest, newest trend I see is a result of a growing interest in watching our spending. With the recession upon us, many people are looking at their food bill and making cuts. Some of these changes are positive as far as nutrition is concerned, since one of the biggest trends I am seeing is people cooking and eating at home more often and eating out less. Often the meals we prepare at home are healthier, smaller and contain less fat, calories and salt than those prepared in restaurants.

We are purchasing fewer prepared foods and treats, focusing on staples instead. In addition, when we do eat out, we are eating smaller portions, as people are sharing more often, ordering one course rather than two. More of us are bringing lunch to work rather than eating restaurant food, which means we are cutting back on calories, fat, salt, sugar and portion size.

Another trend that is a continuation from last year but expanding in 2009 is the push toward buying local foods. Grocery stores are advertising meats, produce, dairy and baked goods that are locally grown and produced. This is in an effort to protect the environment by making our carbon footprint smaller as well as supporting our local economy. In many cases, when we purchase local foods, we are buying in season and getting fresher and healthier food.

The interest in organics is still expanding, and at a great rate, as organics are becoming increasingly affordable and appear in most grocery stores.

The trend to list and/or remove trans fat continues. Don't be fooled by claims on the front of the box that say foods have no trans fat – read the ingredients.

Tea is a hot trend, with more varieties available, and foods with added nutrients such as calcium and omega 3 continue to be available, as does a push for more "natural" foods with fewer preservatives. More products that are lower in sodium and sugar are being introduced.

All in all, I think we'll see some healthy trends in 2009 and we'll find new products that may be a welcome addition to our diets.

Honouring Holtzberg

Chabad Lubavitch of Markham will host an event for women that examines the convergence of inner and outer beauty.

Proceeds of the Feb. 1 event are being donated to the Moshe Holtzberg Fund. Moshe is the son of Rabbi Gavriel and Rivkah Holtzberg of Chabad Lubavitch of Mumbai, who lost their lives in the recent terrorist attack there.

The event is being sponsored by Ferro Hair Art & Spa, and participants will be treated to a morning of pampering, spirited discussion, free gifts, door prizes, and lots of tips from experts on how to look your best at every age.

Guest speaker Goldie Plotkin will be talking about Rebbetzin Holtzberg and the many profound ways in which she exemplified inner beauty.

"This event is a cross between the television shows What Not to Wear and Extreme Makeover," said Allison Solomon, program chair. "We have experts presenting who will talk about fashions and makeup tips at all ages, all body types, and all styles.

"But we also want to be able to pay tribute to the legacy of the Holtzbergs, and to talk about the true meaning of beauty. One's capacity to give back speaks to that virtue."

The event takes place from 10:30 a.m. to 1 p.m. at 83 Green Lane and will include brunch. Tickets are $30, and fund raised will be delivered directly to the Holtzberg grandparents in Israel.

For more information, please contact Plotkin at 905-886-0420 or rebbetzin@chabadmarkham.org.

Hamas using women, kids as human shields: expert

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

More than 70 students and young professionals squeezed into The House last week to learn how Israel found itself in a second war since 2006.

Ari Applbaum, an educator with The David Project, a non-profit educational organization that "promotes a fact-based understanding of the Arab-Israeli conflict," was in Toronto last week to present a lecture titled "What Is the Deal with Hamas?" sponsored by the Birthright Alumni Community, The House and the Canadian Centre for Israel Activism.

"We cannot understand the situation in Gaza without talking about the role of Syria, Saudi Arabia, Egypt and Iran," said Applbaum, who lives in Jerusalem and served in the Israel Defence Forces from 1998 to 2001 and went on to obtain a master's degree in security studies at Tel Aviv University.

"The IDF believes that parts of the rockets are created in Iran. The funding for a lot of Hamas' operations are coming from Iran. Iran in a sense, as part of a greater strategy, is using the two-pronged proxies of Hezbollah and Hamas to really make Israel's life difficult."

He said Syria is also a big funder of Hamas, whose headquarters is in Damascus.

Meanwhile, Saudi Arabia is competing with Egypt to fulfil the role as the leader in the Arab world.

Despite having signed a peace agreement with Israel in 1979, Egypt has been a major factor in the conflict since the 1967 war.

Through Egypt, there has been an enormous amount of smuggling weapons through tunnels into Gaza, Applbaum said.

"Egypt has not been an active party in facilitating this," Applbaum said, "but it certainly has not done everything in its power to stop the smuggling."

He said that after the Six Day War, when Israel offered to return the conquered Gaza Strip to Egypt in exchange for peace, Egypt declined the offer, because it didn't want to be responsible for the population there.

After 20 years of Israeli rule, in 1987, the first intifadah began and Hamas was founded.

Ironically, Israel encouraged the formation of Hamas, he said.

"Hamas was started as a grassroots organization formed from different charities. Israel did encourage those charities to help them build schools and hospitals. The idea was if we help them help each other, they will calm things down and we won't experience much more of this intifadah."

However, unlike Fatah, which takes a more national approach to the conflict, Hamas operates on the principle of religious fundamentalism and is violently opposed to the concept of a Jewish state in Israel.

He said that over the past few years, Israel was learning to better prevent suicide bombings, but at the turn of the century, terrorists graduated to producing and launching primitive rockets called Qassams.

"There were very few in 2001, but it has increased every single year since... Every year the... range grows and every year the accuracy gets better, and Israel doesn't know how to deal with this threat."

When Hamas won the Palestinian parliamentary elections in 2006, Applbaum said that Israel and the Palestine Liberation Organization weren't sure how to handle having Hamas in a position of power.

Rejecting a unity government with Fatah, Hamas violently overthrew the government in Gaza.

Israel decided not to recognize Hamas as a legitimate political group, closed the border, cut all ties with Gaza and did everything it could to strengthen Fatah, in hopes that the Palestinians would turn on Hamas. But, he said, it only increased resentment and hostilities against Israel.

Because of the increasing number of rockets threatening Israeli communities, Israel agreed to a ceasefire with Hamas in 2008. But throughout the ceasefire, Qassams continued to fall and Hamas continued to smuggle weapons and build more tunnels, he said.

"Three weeks ago, they started a barrage of dozens and dozens of Qassams and Grad missiles that have a longer range," Applbaum said. Israel then started Operation Cast Lead, its Gaza offensive.

He said Israel's main goals are to end rocket fire and terror attacks from the Gaza Strip and to weaken Hamas' structure.

He added that after three weeks of fighting, the Qassam rate has been reduced, many Hamas operatives have been killed, hundreds have been captured, and according to a report, 70 per cent of the tunnels have been destroyed.

Despite international pressure for a ceasefire, Applbaum said that Israel can't agree to a ceasefire if Hamas continues to smuggle weapons and build its arsenal.

In response to the allegation that Israel is using disproportionate force in Gaza, Applbaum said, "Every state has the right to self-defence, and no state needs to adjust its capabilities to the capabilities of the group or country that is threatening it."

He acknowledged that many civilians have been caught in the crossfire, but said that Israel does everything it can to avoid civilian casualties.

"Hamas has been deploying a method of human shields, using children, women to protect them," he said, showing images of rockets being fired from backyards, school playgrounds, cemeteries and mosques.

He said that when it comes to delivering a message to the media, he is impressed with Israel's insistence that "no other country would allow even one rocket to be launched at a city," and that "is one argument that in any interview has not been combated."

An amazing and colourful culinary journey

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

Janna Gur's stunning new cookbook, The Book of New Israeli Food (Schocken, 2008), is a magnificent coffee-table book as well as a complete cookbook. She brings us the sumptuous colour, culinary diversity and history of today's Israeli cuisine, beautifully illustrated by Eilon Paz, a photographer who is intimate with the local Israeli scene.

Gur was born and raised in the former Soviet Union and immigrated to Israel in 1974. She lives in Tel Aviv and is the founder and chief editor of Al Hashulchan Gastronomic Monthly (On the Table), the leading Israeli food and wine magazine.

She recently taught a class about the new Israeli cuisine at Bonnie Stern's cooking school in Toronto. When I interviewed Gur by telephone, she shared with me her passion for the new Israeli food and the integrity of using pure Israeli ingredients.

In her intriguing introduction to The Book of New Israeli Food, she describes Israeli food as a product of diverse cultures. The Jews of the Diaspora, settling in a homeland that was new to them, brought their varied cuisines to the table and integrated additional ingredients and ideas from their Arab neighbours.

Her delicious, easy-to-follow recipes represent these influences and include some creative interpretations of classics by celebrated Israeli chefs, including Beetroot and Pomegranate Salad, Fish Falafel in Spicy Harissa Mayonnaise and Homemade Shawarma. You'll also find interesting recipes for Jerusalem Mixed Grill, Traditional Chopped Liver as well as Chocolate and Halva Coffeecake.

The Book of New Israeli Food offers a culinary experience for every occasion, richly spiced and imbued with cross-cultural flavours. All of this is enriched by Paz's vibrantly coloured photographs along with short narratives about significant aspects of Israel's diverse cuisine, such as the generous and unique Israeli breakfast (which grew out of the needs of kibbutz life), locally produced cheeses that rival those of Europe and a dramatic renaissance of wine culture in this ancient land.

Here is an excerpt from Gur's The Book of New Israeli Food about the upcoming holiday of Tu b'Shvat, which falls on Feb. 9 this year:

"Originally not a festival at all, Tu b'Shvat was merely a date on the Jewish calendar, literally 'the 15th day of Shvat.' This was the date on which the age of trees was calculated for the purposes of tithing and taxing. Thus, in Judaica sources, it came to be known as the New Year for the Trees. In biblical times, Tu b'Shvat was the day farmers brought the first fruits of their trees to the Temple in Jerusalem. When the Temple was destroyed and the Jewish People were exiled from the Land of Israel, Tu b'Shvat lost much of its original significance, only to be rediscovered in the Middle Ages by Jewish mystics who imbued it with deeper symbolic meaning.

"The Tu b'Shvat seder meal was established by the Kabbalists of Safed, modelled after the Passover seder and featuring the seven species of the Land of Israel: wheat, barley, vines, figs, pomegranates, olive oil and dates, the staples of the biblical period… Jews all over the world marked the day by eating fruits of the Land of Israel, mainly dried ones like figs and dates, raisins and almonds… As far as food is concerned – every Jewish holiday must have some culinary aspect – Israelis still feast on dried fruit, even though fresh fruits abound even at the height of winter."

FIGS STUFFED WITH BULGUR AND CRANBERRY SALAD

Figs, fresh or dried, with their sweet luscious flesh and firm skin, are perfect for stuffing. Here is a light, healthy dish to enjoy.

10 fresh figs
pomegranate concentrate, for serving

Salad
3 1/2 oz. (100 g) bulgur wheat
1/2 cup dried cranberries, chopped coarsely
1 cup carrots, grated coarsely
2-3 tbsp. fresh coriander, chopped
1 tbsp. sesame seeds, roasted
3 tbsp. pecans, chopped
2 tbsp. pomegranate concentrate

Soak the bulgur wheat in water for 4-5 hours, until it swells up and softens. Or add half a cup of water to the wheat and cook in a microwave oven for 3-4 minutes until the bulgur softens and absorbs the water. Allow to cool.

Mix the bulgur with the other salad ingredients. The preparation up to this point may be done in advance and the salad kept in the refrigerator.

Halve the figs and scoop out some of the flesh, which you can add to the salad. Place 2 fig halves on each plate, heap on the salad, sprinkle with pomegranate concentrate and serve. Serves 10.

Pomegranate concentrate (also known as pomegranate syrup) is available in Middle-Eastern stores. If you can't find it, boil pomegranate juice until it reduces to a syrupy consistency.

TU B'SHVAT CAKE

Lots and lots of dried fruits and nuts and just a little bit of dough to hold them all together. The choice of fruit is all yours, the more the merrier. Just remember to combine different colours to make the cake more attractive. This dense, juicy, not overly sweet cake will keep for a long time.

7 tbsp. flour
7 tbsp. sugar
3 eggs
7 oz. (200 g) assorted dried fruits (prunes, apricots, raisins, figs, papaya, cranberries)
7 oz. (200 g) assorted nuts (walnuts, pecans, hazelnuts, almonds)
1/2 tsp. cinnamon
1/4 tsp. nutmeg
small pinch of ground cloves

Preheat oven to 300. Mix flour, sugar, eggs and spices.

Chop larger dried fruits (apricots, prunes, papaya) coarsely. Add them with the rest of the fruits and nuts to the dough and mix thoroughly. Transfer to a greased loaf pan and bake for 1-1/2 hours, until the cake is a deep golden-brown.

Cool completely and slice very thin with a bread knife, but only what you plan to serve. The unsliced cake keeps better. Makes 1 loaf pan.

Dr. Martin Saul Rosen (1924-2009) ז"ל

Suddenly on January 1, 2009, Martin Rosen, beloved husband of Helen (Goldberg), loving father of Denise (Terry), Arthur (Irene), Charles (Susan), Michael (Eva), Mark (Joanne) and Paula. Devoted grandfather of Jason (Melisa), Jessica, Daniel, Noah, Samantha, Joel, Lianne and Nyomi. Brother to Arthur (deceased WW II), Sydney and Isabel. Martin served in the Royal Canadian Air Force in World War II and then graduated from the University of Toronto Medical School in 1950. Martin practiced medicine in Toronto for many years at Mount Sinai Hospital, Doctors Hospital, the Baycrest Centre, and Humber Memorial Hospital, where he served on the hospital board. He left Canada in 1980 and continued in family medicine for 10 years in Vernon, Texas, followed by 5 years on the psychiatric staff at the Vernon State Hospital. Martin then moved to Palm Desert, California where he enjoyed a busy and active retirement. Martin will be sadly missed by all of us, but the legacy he leaves behind is rich and bountiful. Private service. Memorial donations may be made to Canadian Magen David Adom for Israel, 4580 Dufferin Street, Suite 508, Toronto, Ontario M3H 5Y2 (416-780-0034).

It is with our deepest appreciation that we thank our family and friends for your generosity, friendship, comfort and understanding during our time of sorrow.
Your thoughtfulness will be remembered.

The family of the late

GAIL KOVEN ז"ל

Max and Alex, Susie & Jake Grossman, Barbara & Steven Yack

Pomerantz, Gordon. Peacefully at the St. Catharines General on Wednesday January 7, 2009 in his 86th year. Gordon Pomerantz, beloved husband of Freda Pomerantz (nee Litvack). Loving father of Dale (and Mark Mayerson), Jill Pomerantz and Miriam (and Jeff Sharpe). Adored grandfather of Katie, Keith, Shauna, Justin, Tyler and Ryan. Dear brother of Sylvia (and the late Arnold Keshen) and Aaron Pomerantz (and Joan). Dear brother-in-law of Sarah Pomerantz, Marvin (and Shirley) Litvack and Fanny Brass. Gordon will be remembered for his generosity, for his sense of humour and for his devotion to family, cousins, nieces, nephews and their families. Predeceased by two brothers Morris and Joe. Gordon owned and ran Pomerantz Clothing and Footwear in Thorold for many years and then opened Uniform Sportswear tailor shop in St. Catharines. Funeral service was held Friday January 9, 2009 at Patrick J. Darte Funeral Chapel, 39 Court Street, St. Catharines (905-685-6584) at 1pm in the funeral home chapel. Interment was held at B'nai Israel Cemetery. In lieu of flowers, donations to the Congregation B'nai Israel (905-685-6767) or to the charity of your choice would be appreciated by the family.

"FOREVER YOUNG"

It is with profound sadness that we mark another year without our adored and courageous daughter Zoe. She is remembered in the hearts of her parents, Judy and Steve, her sister Lindsay, her Grandmother Rhoda and her many wonderful aunts and uncles, cousins and friends. She remains forever loved, forever missed and forever in our thoughts and memories – never to be forgotten.

Zoe, we love and miss you more than words …

Another Exciting Year At Camp B'nai Brith Of Ottawa

Located on the edge of the Gatineau Hills, 45 from Ottawa, CBB Ottawa is a privately owned overnight camp. We have a long and successful camping history of well over 70 years. Our camp prides itself in welcoming children from all over the world, attracting many campers from Ottawa, Montreal, Toronto, United States, Israel and other locations worldwide

B'nai Brith of Ottawa's program is balanced between athletics and the arts offering a number of different activities such as drama, dance, arts & crafts, music, many sports and a variety of long-standing "all camp" programs such as Grey Cup/Super Bowl, World Cup and Colour War. Being located on the Ottawa River, watersports are the pride and joy of our program. They include: waterskiing (4 waterski boats), wakeboarding, kayaking, canoeing, sailing and a canoe-tripping program that takes place amidst the beauty and diversity of Algonquin Park. Campers receive swim instruction in the Olympic-sized heated pool from qualified swim instructors using the curriculum of the Lifesaving Society. Our facilities include an indoor gym, dance studio, recreation hall, 4 lighted tennis courts, 2 outdoor basketball courts, 3 playing fields, and an on site health center which has fully qualified medical staff.

Meals are prepared in a kosher kitchen (Ottawa VAAD Kashruth) and the camp is PEANUT and NUT SENSITIVE. In addition, there is a Judaica program, that includes weekly Shabbat Services, that is fun yet traditional.

CBB has 3 very successful programs for NEW campers. Firstly, we offer a Weekender Program, that allows a camper to attend and participate in all of our programs for a weekend, secondly, there is a 2 week starter camp for children ages 7-12 (many decide to extend their stay). Lastly, there is a welcome program which pairs younger campers with older campers prior to and during camp. If you are interested in giving your child an active, stimulating and exciting summer camp experience, then Camp B'nai Brith of Ottawa is the place to be

Camp Kadimah – Generations of Memories

A Jewish identity is a great gift. Jewish Camping creates the possibility for building Jewish leaders through peer to peer education, lasting friendships and fun, informal Judaic programming that kids remember and cherish for a lifetime.

Camp Kadimah is entering its 65th summer on the beautiful shores of Lake William, two hours outside of Halifax, Nova Scotia. We offer a wide range of activities for children ages 7-16 including arts and crafts, land sports, water-ski and wake-boarding, sailing, canoe and kayak, Red Cross and Royal Lifesaving instructional swim, drama, Israeli song and dance, and scouting. As a proud member of Canadian Young Judaea, our program team and schlichim from Israel ensure fun Zionist content to inspire a knowledge and love of Israel in our campers.

At Kadimah, we take a holistic approach to programming, exposing campers to a full range of programming, including a four day camp wide Maccabia colour war, camping trips to National and Provincial parks, and local sites, theme days, a hockey marathon, and softball, basketball and volleyball house leagues. Optional sport teams, art projects, camping trips, boating races, nature programs with ecologists from nearby universities are some of the ways that campers can involve themselves further in camp life.

Younger campers enjoy a range of special programming including outings to the Atlantic Ocean, local farms, a camp carnival and theme days. Our Machar program, for our oldest campers 14-15 year olds, is designed to be challenging and fun, addressing Israeli culture and politics, as well as Jewish ethics.

Our Counselor In Training (CIT) program gives 16 year olds the chance to experience working on different types of programming throughout camp, working with campers in cabins, and leadership training. The CIT program incorporates volunteer opportunities with local camps and towns to encourage leadership and tzedakah. A 5 day trip in Atlantic Canada promotes CITs learning about local culture, small Jewish Communities, and visit beautiful Atlantic Canada.

Camp Kadimah is a place where generations have danced and sung the same songs. A place of first loves, first accomplishments, and standing ovations. It is a place where kids can feel a part of a community of peers, and be given a chance to shine at what they do best.

Troop pullout begins after tentative truce

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspapers Ltd

JERUSALEM — The Israel Defence Forces was gradually withdrawing grounds forces from the Gaza Strip on Monday, following a tentative truce with Hamas that allowed Palestinians to take stock of the devastating three-week war.

Troops and tanks that had poured into Gaza on Jan. 3 as part of an offensive to counter Palestinian rocket attacks began pulling out on Sunday evening, though the army said they remained ready to tackle any flare-ups in fighting.

Israeli officials have said that troops would withdraw completely before Barack Obama's inauguration on Tuesday as the new U.S. president. The officials spoke on condition of anonymity because the plan has not been publicly announced.

Government spokesperson Mark Regev would not confirm the timetable. He said only that if Gaza remains quiet Israel's departure would be almost immediate.

Early morning of Jan. 19, IDF troops are seen leaving the Gaza strip after Israel declared a ceasefire on Saturday. [Yossi Zamir/Flash90 photo]

Israel and Hamas separately declared ceasefires on Sunday, to the relief of western powers that, while publicly sympathetic to Israel's security concerns, were alarmed by the mounting humanitarian toll in the impoverished territory.

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said Sunday that Israel does not intend to keep a military presence inside the Gaza Strip, nor does it aim to reconquer the territory, despite its three-week offensive on the Hamas-ruled coastal enclave.

He told European leaders visiting Jerusalem on Sunday evening that in the wake of the ceasefire, Israel planned to withdraw all of its troops as soon as possible. He said that such a move would come when the situation between Israel and Gaza was "stable."

As Palestinians emerged from hiding, agape at the killing of more than 1,300 fellow Gazans and at the widespread destruction of homes and government infrastructure, the head of the Hamas administration claimed a "popular victory" against Israel.

"The enemy has failed to achieve its goals," Ismail Haniyeh said in a speech.

Hamas's truce decision, conditioned on Israel withdrawing within a week, was "wise and responsible," he said.

Though some 20 rockets struck the Negev on Sunday amid truce declarations, Olmert declared the mission accomplished — noting a flurry of diplomatic efforts by the United States, Egypt and European countries to prevent Hamas rearming.

That would mean as yet unspecified measures to stop Hamas smuggling weapons across the Egypt-Gaza frontier, a sensitive matter given Cairo's past efforts to play down its scope.

Public Security Minister Avi Dichter threatened a military response to any renewed flow of arms into the Gaza Strip, saying Israel would view such smuggling as an attack on its territory.

"That means, if smuggling is renewed, Israel will view it as if it were fired upon," Dichter told Israel Radio.

For now, Gaza's situation looks much as it did before the conflict – armed standoff and a dim future for the 1.5 million people fenced inside the strip by a blockade aimed at punishing Islamist Hamas for rocket fire and ambitions to destroy Israel.

According to the Palestinian Statistics Bureau, some 4,000 residential buildings were reduced to rubble during the conflict. Western diplomats have said it could cost at least $1.6 billion to repair the infrastructure damage in Gaza.

Hamas officials, during talks with Egyptian mediators, said the faction demanded the opening of all Gaza's border crossings for the entry of materials, food, goods and basic needs.

Meanwhile, Israel announced on Monday that it would allow 200 trucks carrying humanitarian aid to enter Gaza, Israel Radio reported.

In Israel, which lost 10 troops in combat and three civilians to rocket attacks, the offensive was popular, and bolstered the prospects of Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni and Defence Minister Ehud Barak before a Feb. 10 election.

Yet opinion polls still predict an easy win for right-wing opposition leader Benjamin Netanyahu, who had opposed Israel's 2005 withdrawal from Gaza after 38 years, arguing that it would embolden hardline Palestinian Islamists.

Though much of the international community shuns Hamas, it has strong grassroots support and Gaza's suffering threatened to sap the credibility of Western-backed Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and his efforts to negotiate peace with Israel.

Israel preparing for Iran bid to rearm Hamas in Gaza

By AMOS HAREL AND AVI ISSACHAROFF
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Analysis

A long column of Israel Defence Forces infantrymen made its way back to Israeli territory from Gaza on Sunday morning. A number of the officers remembered a similar march in August 2006, from southwest Lebanon back to Israel.

The paratroopers held Israeli flags this time, too. But this time, the feelings were not those of bitterness or missed opportunities, but of satisfaction. From the IDF's point of view – from Chief of Staff Lt.-Gen. Gabi Ashkenazi to battle-tested privates – it fulfilled its mission. If the government had ordered the IDF to conquer all of Gaza, it would have fulfilled this mission, too.

In the field, a minimal number of ground forces have been left behind to control key positions until the final order is given to leave Gaza completely. This apparently won't take much time. Hamas also understands this. Its announcement Sunday that it would agree to an immediate ceasefire if the IDF finishes its withdrawal within a week was co-ordinated in advance with Egypt. Cairo forced Hamas to make the announcement, promising in return that by the end of the week there would be no more Israeli soldiers in Gaza.

The IDF, however, will continue to amass conscript troops along the Gaza-Israel border, as a threat. Some reservists will be released from duty in the coming days, if rocket fire against Israel does indeed diminish. On Sunday evening, the IDF General Staff believed that smaller Palestinian militant groups in Gaza were responsible for the last rockets launched into Israel, and that Hamas and Islamic Jihad are interested in stabilizing the ceasefire. If substantial rocket fire continues, however, Israel will respond harshly.

As IDF troops have left Gaza City, their positions have been taken by Hamas police, who have been sent into the streets. The deployment of police, dozens of whom were killed in the Israeli Air Force bombing of a cadets' graduation ceremony on the first day of the offensive, was meant to show that Hamas has survived the Israeli assault. But this claim is far from true. Hamas' capabilities are limited, and its regime is only partially functioning. On the other hand, the group's military wing still has enough armed men to deter the rival Fatah movement from attempting a coup in the coastal territory.

The real condition of Hamas will soon become clear. Khaled Meshal, the group's Damascus-based politburo chief, admitted that it had suffered "a harsh blow," but he also claimed "the resistance has not been defeated." It will now take a week to estimate the quality of Israeli deterrence against Hamas. In its announcement Sunday, Hamas said it expected Gaza's border crossings to be opened for the flow of humanitarian goods. This is a critical point for Hamas, one that led it to reject a truce agreement exactly one month ago.

The problem is even more pressing since Israel has seemingly disabled a large number of smuggling tunnels running through the Gaza-Egypt border. The tunnels were not only used to smuggle weapons, but also basic goods, such as petrol, food and cigarettes. In light of the economic hardship in Gaza, Hamas is still likely to renew the rocket fire next week if the crossings aren't opened. Israel is aware of this and the defence establishment is hinting there may be a more lenient policy toward the crossings, if total quiet is indeed enforced in Gaza.

When Hamas estimates the balance of gains and losses in the war, it can still point to one or two achievements. On a military level, it didn't succeed in causing substantial losses to the IDF, despite its threats, but it did preserve a capability to launch rockets until the last day of the campaign. In the international realm, it received significant public support from Arab states. European recognition of the Hamas regime is continuing to be established, and the Italian foreign minister is expected to visit Gaza. The Palestinian representative at the Arab summit at Doha was Meshal, not Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas.

Sarkozy urges all sides to restart peace talks

None of the European leaders condemned Israel for these casualties.

After the meeting, Olmert said that Israel would soon withdraw its troops from Gaza.

At a press conference on Sunday, Sarkozy vowed that the European Union would never harm the security of Israel.

Sarkozy said that France would be willing to provide monitors to prevent arms smuggling into Gaza and supply technology to help locate smuggling tunnels.

The French leader urged Israelis and Palestinians to restart peace talks as soon as possible after the Israel Defence Forces withdrawal from the Gaza Strip and called for a summit with the Palestinian Authority to discuss the peace process.

Sarkozy said that IDF soldier Gilad Schalit, who has been held captive by Gaza militants since a cross-border raid in 2006, must be released, adding that he was certain Israel would be willing to free Palestinian prisoners in exchange.

After the Sharm summit, Sarkozy stressed the need for Israel to quickly pull its forces out of Gaza, after three weeks of an offensive on the Hamas-ruled territory.

"Israel should state immediately and clearly that if rocket fire will stop, the Israeli army will leave Gaza. There is no other solution to achieve peace," Sarkozy said.

Merkel said that Israel has the right to live in peace and not under threats. The German leader added that arms smuggling into Gaza, whether by sea or by land, must be prevented and that Germany was willing to help address that matter if necessary.

Brown said that the European Union will do everything to support the ceasefire, as a step toward achieving a comprehensive peace.

The British prime minister called on Hamas to stop firing rockets on Israel and expressed willingness to help in the effort to stop weapons smuggling into Gaza. He urged Israel to open the border crossings into the coastal strip and to allow humanitarian aid in as soon as possible.

Berlusconi said that he was proud of the fact that it was he who put Hamas on the EU's list of terrorist organizations. He promised that that he would work toward inducting Israel as a full member of the EU.

The Italian leader expressed willingness to provide military personnel to battle arms smuggling into Gaza. "When I heard about the rocket fire at Israel, I felt that it was a danger to Italy, and to the entire West," he said.

Zapatero, who had never visited Israel before Sunday, joined his colleagues in voicing his support for Israel, despite the harsh criticism he had expressed toward Israel during the three-week operation in Gaza. "I am moved that the ceasefire was announced when I came to Israel," the Spanish prime minister said, adding that he hoped for a renewal of the peace process.

Authors & Poets

The CJN is pleased to announce its

Annual Passover Literary Supplement

We invite our readers to submit unpublished, original works of fiction or poetry that explore Jewish themes. Stories should not exceed 2,000 words.

We must receive your submissions no later than Friday, March 12. E-mail submissions are preferred, but works can also be sent by mail or brought to our office.

E-mail: info@cjnews.com. Mail: 1500 Don Mills Rd., Suite 205, Toronto, Ont., M3B 3K4.

Submissions will not be returned. Only writers whose work is chosen for publication will be contacted.

CJN Purim Art Contest

It's time again for our annual Purim Art Contest.

Who can enter: Children in grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN's 2009 Purim Poster. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However, they should not be too small nor too large. Please paint or draw bright, bold, colourful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. Please send us your name, address, phone number, age and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, Toronto, Ont., M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 3 p.m. on Tuesday, Feb. 17, 2009. We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen as the "winners." The judges will base their decisions on a number of factors such as: the use of colour, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The chances of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, February 20, 2009.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of March 5, 2009. Have fun and good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

Two countries cut ties with Israel

JTA

CARACAS — Bolivia and Venezuela have cut diplomatic ties with Israel over Israel's operation in Gaza.

Bolivian President Evo Morales said he also would ask that the World Criminal Court charge Israeli leaders with genocide, according to media reports.

"The Israeli government's crimes affect global stability and peace and have returned the world to the worst stage of crimes against humanity that we hadn't seen except in World War II and in the last years in the former Yugoslavia and Rwanda," Morales said.

The Israeli government said Jan. 14 it had not yet been notified by the Bolivian government of its decision to end diplomatic relations.

Venezuela officially broke off diplomatic relations several hours after the Bolivian announcement. The official announcement follows the Jan. 6 expulsion of Israel's ambassador to Caracas and seven embassy staff members by Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez, a close ally of Morales.

A statement released Jan. 14 by the Venezuelan foreign ministry said the country "has decided to break off diplomatic relations with the state of Israel given the inhumane persecution of the Palestinian people," according to reports.

B'nai B'rith International (BBI) called Bolivia's decision a "troubling development in the region," noting that "Bolivia has enjoyed excellent relations with Israel for many years" and that the two countries have several co-operative programs.

"It is noteworthy that this announcement was made a day after Morales met with an Iranian delegation headed by Iranian Minister of Co-operation Mohammad Abbasi," BBI said in a statement. "Iran has been trying to expand its influence in Latin America for years, and this episode only underscores Morales' willingness to co-operate with the Iranian government that sponsors terror worldwide and has one of the worst human rights records in the world."

Israel prepares for Iran bid to rearm Hamas

The war in Gaza and the Doha summit on it, however, showed the internal divisions in the Arab world. An alliance of moderates – Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Jordan and the PA – leads a strategic line against Hamas. This pragmatic Arab camp knows the real battle is being fought against Iran, which wishes to undermine Mideast stability and weaken moderate regimes. In this fight, Tehran doesn't intend to neglect its Palestinian project, even if it encountered the most serious threat to its existence in recent weeks.

All the intelligence assessments in Israel indicate that Iran seeks to rearm Hamas with rockets and will aspire to widen their range so as to be able to hit Tel Aviv. Egypt, whose President Hosni Mubarak has already defined a Hamas state in Gaza as an Iranian satellite that has grown on its doorstep, has a considerable interest in preventing the group's re-armament. Is Cairo's stated desire and the new Israel-U.S. agreement enough to curb the smuggling and prevent another escalation? Opinion in Israel is split, but this will be the key question in light of which the Gaza campaign's success will be determined.

Canada alone in opposing UN vote against Israel

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Canada is being commended for standing alone to oppose a "one-sided" UN resolution critical of Israel in its war against Hamas.

The United Nations Human Rights Council (UNHRC) voted 33-1 with 13 abstentions on a resolution that called for a halt to military attacks in Gaza and an immediate Israeli withdrawal. The resolution also branded Israel's military operation an "aggression" that had "resulted in massive violations of the human rights of the Palestinian people and systematic destruction of the Palestinian infrastructure."

Hillel Neuer

The resolution, passed last week during the council's ninth special session, also called for the "dispatch of an urgent independent international fact-finding mission to investigate all violations of international human rights law and international humanitarian law by the occupying power against the Palestinian people throughout the Occupied Palestinian Territory."

"Canada has to be commended for taking the position it did at the UNHRC," said Moshe Ronen, chair of the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC), the Jewish community's advocacy arm for Israel. "The resolution was unfair at the least and a farce at best. There was no mention of Hamas and its ongoing attacks. It pointed the finger at Israel."

Hillel Neuer, executive director of UN Watch, a Geneva-based organization that monitors United Nations' actions on human rights, said, "Canada showed courage and leadership in defending the principle of human rights and in opposing unfair attacks by the Islamic and Arab countries to legitimize Hamas and grant impunity to Hamas. The resolution ignored the suffering of one million Israeli civilians who are under constant rocket fire. Canada is to be saluted for its moral leadership."

Prior to casting the opposing vote, Marius Grinius, Canada's representative at the UNHRC, said "the draft text still failed to clearly recognize that rocket fire on Israel had led to the current crisis. It also used unnecessary, unhelpful and inflammatory language."

Israel's representative, Aharon Leshno-Yaar, quoted former UN secretary general Kofi Annan asking whether all the UN resolutions and conferences had provided any tangible benefits to the Palestinians.

Furthermore, "in the real world, there could be no meaningful consensus without Israel. The current resolution was not balanced and did not reflect the realities in the Gaza Strip and did no service to the cause of peace or to the human suffering of Palestinians in Gaza… Such a resolution would only embolden Hamas and weaken the trust of the Israeli public in the United Nations and the council," Leshno-Yaar said.

Moshe Ronen

The Palestinian representative, Ibrahim Khraishi, said "the open wound that the Palestinian people had suffered had been offered at the altar of the Human Rights Council, and it was hoped this would be remedied… The barbaric acts of aggression required the calling for the establishment of a fact-finding mission to investigate Israeli slaughters and acts of terror."

The resolution was supported by a host of Asian and African states – most of them dictatorships – that were joined by Argentina, India, Mexico, Nicaragua, Philippines and Russia.

European Union countries abstained, along with Cameroon, Japan and South Korea.

Ronen called the Europeans' stance "a gutless position to take. Hamas and Islamic organizations threaten countries that don't oppose Israel and support Hamas in their terrorist activities. The Europeans were cowed and browbeaten by these threats."

Canadian minister visits Mumbai

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

While Citizenship, Immigration and Multiculturalism Minister Jason Kenney was on his week-long trip to Pakistan and India earlier this month, he expressed Canada's solidarity with the victims of the Mumbai terror attacks in November and visited the Chabad House that was the scene of brutal murder.

Speaking in a teleconference call from New Delhi last week, Kenney said that among the many meetings he had with various politicians in both Pakistan and India, he met with the Pakistani prime minister, foreign minister and national security adviser to "emphasize Canada's expectation that Pakistan would co-operate fully with Indian authorities investigating and bringing to justice any and all responsible for the Nov. 26 attacks in Mumbai."

Jason Kenney

More than 170 people died in the attacks on hotels, tourist hot spots and the Chabad House in Mumbai, including two Canadians and nine Jews. The directors of the Chabad House, Rabbi Gavriel Holtzberg and his wife, Rivka, were among the murdered.

Kenney said he travelled to Mumbai last week to visit the Taj Mahal hotel – one of the targets in the attacks – to sign a condolence book and to meet the staff on duty when the terrorists struck.

He also spoke of his opportunity to pay his respects to the Mumbai Jewish community at the historic Blue Synagogue, where he addressed a gathering that included Canadian and German consulate representatives.

"I met the remarkably diverse Mumbai Jewish community that has a remarkable multicultural makeup," he said.

"I gave a speech to some 100 people there expressing Canada's solidarity with the people of India, the people of Mumbai, and particularly, the Jewish community following the terrible events of Nov. 26 to the 29th."

Kenney added that he was also given a tour of the Chabad House by two Canadian Chabadniks, Menachem Sputz and Mendel Kessler.

"I was shown the premises, all five floors, by two remarkable young Canadian members of the Chabad movement who were dispatched to help the community in the wake of the murder of the rabbi [and his wife] during the attacks," Kenney said.

"It was a deeply moving experience, unsettling and disturbing at the same time, to see the incredible devastation and violence that came to that house of peace and prayer, and that is something I certainly will never forget."

WJC plenary set for Israel

Compiled by CJN Staff

NEW YORK — The 13th Plenary Assembly of the World Jewish Congress (WJC) takes place on Jan. 26 and 27 in Jerusalem.

The WJC represents Jewish communities in more than 80 countries around the globe. The 13th plenary assembly's motto is, "We stand by Israel."

More than 400 representatives of Jewish communities are expected to attend the meeting. The plenary assembly is the highest decision-making body of the WJC and meets every four years.

Founded in Geneva in 1936, the WJC serves as the diplomatic arm of the Jewish people to governments and international organizations.

Apart from elections for WJC president and executive officers, delegates will also discuss the military conflict in Gaza and other threats against Israel, as well as the repercussions for Jewish communities around the world, notably the related surge in anti-Semitism.

WJC president Ronald Lauder said: "At this meeting, we want to give the people of Israel our full support and show them that they are not alone in the face of attacks by militant Islamists which threaten the very existence of the State of Israel."

Debates on other international developments, such as the recent Mumbai terror attacks, efforts to delegitimize Israel in international bodies, and the situation in Venezuela are also on the agenda.

On Jan. 27, delegates mark International Holocaust Remembrance Day in a special ceremony at Yad Vashem, Israel's Holocaust memorial institution in Jerusalem.

Senior Israeli politicians, including Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni, Diaspora Affairs Minister Yitzhak Herzog, Likud party leader Benjamin Netanyahu and Jerusalem Mayor Nir Barkat will address the plenary assembly.

Defiance tells a Holocaust story of survival and courage

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The Bielski brothers were heroes and role models in the deepest sense of the word. During the Holocaust, when the darker side of human nature manifested itself day by day, they fought back ferociously and behaved selflessly.

At the end of 1941, after their parents were murdered by the Nazis in eastern Poland, they formed a partisan band and lived off the land. The Bielskis could have left it at that and concerned themselves solely with self-preservation. Instead, they risked their lives by inviting other Jews, hunted relentlessly by the Nazis and their collaborators, to join their encampment in the depths of the forest.

Historian Nechama Tec wrote a book about the Bielskis, and three years ago, the History Channel broadcast a documentary about them. Edward Zwick, director of Blood Diamond, has followed suit with Defiance, which opened last week.

Starring Daniel Craig –the new James Bond – as Tuvia, one of the brothers, Defiance is aptly titled. The Bielskis are strong, resolute and courageous, and if they must die, they will go down fighting a ruthless enemy. In the film, appropriately enough, they are likened to the ancient Maccabee warriors, who fought for the Jewish people's freedom.

Tuvia Bielski (Daniel Craig) stars in Defiance.

At more than 130 minutes, Defiance might seem excessively long, but in fact it is not and it flows smoothly. And thankfully, it seems historically accurate.

The movie opens with an unusual flourish. Documentary footage of Adolf Hitler stiffly stretching out his arm during one of his ranting speeches dissolves into what appears to be file footage of Nazis rounding up Jews.

This, in turn, fades into Defiance as the two elder Bielskis, Tuvia and Zus (Liev Schreiber), reach their parents' farm and discover they have been murdered. The youngest brother, Asael (Jamie Bell), has survived the massacre.

A Polish peasant who has hidden Jews in his barn informs the Bielskis that the killer is the local police chief. Seeking vengeance, Tuvia tracks him down, coolly shooting him in the presence of his wife and two sons.

When the Polish farmer is no longer able to hide Jews, Tuvia takes them under his wing. Zus protests, saying they are short of food, but Tuvia prevails. Tuvia and Zus also disagree on another matter. Zus, hot-headed, is eager to kill Germans, but Tuvia is more restrained. "We must not become like them," he says.

Yet restraint goes only so far. Eventually, Tuvia participates in retaliatory attacks on collaborators and German patrols. Zwick handles these scenes expertly, creating high tension.

The film is also good at portraying the life and the hardships the partisans endured in the forest.

The Bielski camps, comprising dugouts, bunkers and household structures, were quite sophisticated, given the scarcity of supplies. Yet the partisans suffered from hunger and disease, particularly in winter.

To ease the pain, the men took "forest wives," hooking up with women who sought protection. Tuvia's love interest is played by Alexa Davalos.

Zus ends up joining a Red Amy partisan unit. The Soviet commander is surprised by Zus' combative spirit. "Jews do not fight," he says, echoing an anti-Semitic stereotype. "These Jews do," retorts Zus.

But even as they prove themselves on the battlefield, Jewish fighters embedded with the Red Army encounter grassroots anti-Semitism, which the Russian commander downplays at first.

Certainly, Tuvia demolishes all anti-Semitic myths about Jews. As he sits on a white stallion, resplendent on the saddle, a Jewish boy can hardly believe what he sees. "He is a Jew?" he asks his mother rather incredulously.

As Defiance unfolds, Tuvia grows still stronger and tougher. When a man sharply questions his authority, he shoots him and orders his corpse to be placed in the woods for the wolves.

There are several riveting sequences, and one of the best is a battle scene in which Tuvia's partisans confront a German division spearheaded by a tank.

In yet another unforgettable scene, the Jews in the Bielski camp fall upon a captured German soldier who, in vain, pleads for mercy.

Defiance is never less than interesting, but generally, it is not as gripping as it might have been.

Nonetheless, the cast is uniformly excellent, and Craig and Schreiber are especially effective in their respective roles.

Despite its weaknesses, Defiance tells an important story and tells it reasonably well.

TV series examines life-cycle rites

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Rites of Passage is a new television series that examines key life-cycle moments in many different cultures.

Unfortunately, to see it, you have to subscribe to high-definition television service, as the series is available exclusively on Equator HD (Rogers 550, Bell TV 812), one of several HD-only channels.

Each of the series' 13 half-hour episodes, examines the four common human experiences of birth, coming of age, marriage and death in various religions.

One of the first episodes is on death and looks at the Jewish chevra kadisha, the groups of men or women who prepare the body for ritual burial, as well as Hindu and Taoist death rituals.

Mark Kachuck with his father at his bar mitzvah

Moshe Posner belongs to a chevra kadisha. In the show, he explains how out of respect there is no talking allowed in the room, except for prayers. He explains the symbolism of the white linen used for the shroud, the buckets of water and why twigs are stuck between the corpse's thumb and index finger.

Unfortunately, this scene, shot in a room where the ritual is performed, does not take advantage of the high definition.

The colourful scenes of the Hindu and Taoist death rituals, on the other hand, are truly remarkable.

Another episode compares the Catholic sacrament of confirmation with the bar mitzvah ceremony.

On his 13th Hebrew birthday, Mark Kachuck, like other Jewish young people, becomes a bar mitzvah. We see him at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue in Toronto, reading from the Torah with his friends and family.

At around the same age, Catholic children in Grade 8 celebrate their confirmation, which commemorates the spiritual journey from childhood to adulthood.

Upcoming shows look at the brit milah ceremony, compare Jewish and Muslim wedding ceremonies and examine Hindu, African, Aboriginal and other life-cycle rites.

In examining these rituals, Rites of Passage does a great job of creating understanding between different cultures and shows the differences, and at times, similarities, among various religious ceremonies.

Rites of Passage airs Thursday evenings at 8 p.m.

Mervon Mehta to join Royal Conservatory administration

The Royal Conservatory of Music has announced that Mervon Mehta will be its new executive director of performing arts as of April 1.

The actor, artist and acclaimed arts administrator will be responsible for all aspects of the Royal Conservatory's performing arts business, including programming and managing Koerner Hall, the new 1,140-seat concert hall scheduled to open this fall.

"I am absolutely thrilled to be joining the Royal Conservatory team," Mehta said.

Mehta hails from an impressive musical family. He is the son of conductor Zubin Mehta and voice teacher Carmen Mehta. His grandfather, Mehli Mehta, was a conductor and founder of the Bombay Symphony Orchestra, and his uncle Zarin Mehta is the executive director of the New York Philharmonic.

Mehta returns to Toronto from Philadelphia, where he's been serving as vice-president of programming and education at the Kimmel Center for the Performing Arts since 2002.

Music of Erich Korngold: The Art of Time Ensemble presents Source & Inspiration III, a celebration of the musical genius of Erich Korngold, with original songs by Danny Michel, John Southworth and Martin Tielli.

The Austrian-born Korngold (1897-1957), whom Gustav Mahler once described as a "musical genius," was a brilliant romantic composer. Fortuitously, Warner Brothers summoned him to Hollywood in 1938 to write a film score; he would later say The Adventures of Robin Hood saved his life. Winner of an Academy Award, he is known for his beautifully moving scores for Hollywood films of the 1930s and '40s and is frequently credited with the invention of the modern film score.

The evening of classical and contemporary music begins with artistic director Andrew Burashko performing a Korngold Suite on piano, accompanied by violins and cello. Musical arrangements are by Toronto composers Jonathan Goldsmith and Robert Carli, with accompaniment by Art of Time Ensemble musicians. CBC Radio Two plans to record the concert for later broadcast. Adults $39. Harbourfront Centre Enwave Theatre, 231 Queen's Quay W. Jan. 29 and 30, 8 p.m. 416-973-4000. www. artoftimeensemble.com

Lionel Gelber Prize: A short list of five finalists for the 2009 Lionel Gelber Prize has been announced by Noah Rubin, chair of the prize board and grandnephew of the Canadian scholar, author and diplomat for whom the prize is named. The award is given annually by the Lionel Gelber Foundation in partnership with the Munk Centre for International Studies at the University of Toronto and Washington-based Foreign Policy magazine.

The books, chosen from more than 200 submissions, examine the challenges of war, terrorism, international crime, grand strategy, and a rapidly changing global power structure. The winner will be announced on March 10 and the prize presented in Toronto on March 31.

The finalists are: "How the Power Struggle Between China, India and Japan Will Shape Our Next Decade," by Bill Emmott-Rivals; "A Choice of Enemies: America Confronts the Middle East," by Lawrence Freedman; "McMafia: A Journey Through the Global Criminal Underworld," by Misha Glenny; "Descent into Chaos: The United States and the Failure of Nation Building in Pakistan, Afghanistan, and Central Asia," by Ahmed Rashid; and "The Post-American World," by Fareed Zakaria.

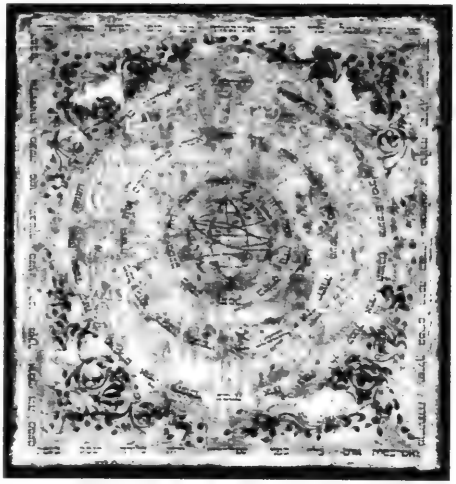
Artist combines anatomy and Hebrew text

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Myriam Nafte is one very busy artist. She can hardly keep up with the demand for her work at Jewish museums and galleries across North America.

She says she's relieved that many of her shows are booked a year or two ahead because "it takes a lot of labour to build up the collection."

Right now, she has an exhibition at the Fine Museum at Temple Emanu-El in San Francisco, and she's finalizing dates for shows in Pittsburgh, Connecticut and New York City.



Fulfilled, one of Myriam Nafte's paintings

Despite these commitments, Nafte has, since 2007, been allocating a number of her works for an annual fundraiser for the Downtown Jewish Community School, which her daughter and son attend.

She is donating 50 per cent of the proceeds from her upcoming show, Mystics, Medics and Merchants, to the school. The show opens 11 a.m. on Jan. 25 in the Jacobs Lounge at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre and runs until March 8.

Nafte, who has a graduate degree in forensic anthropology, combines her knowledge of human anatomy and Hebrew text in her visual art. She incorporates precision drawing and Hebrew inscriptions with layers of acrylic paint – some are in metallic hues – that add texture and luminosity to her work.

Much of this work explores Hebrew letters as imagery, however, her upcoming show at Miles Nadal marks a new direction, she says. "I'm still integrating Hebrew text, but I'm integrating it into fabric of what individuals wore."

Nafte says she's concentrating on portraying people from the Middle Ages such as astronomers and medics, many of whom were Jewish. "The portraits are not facial, but the emphasis is more on what these individuals wore."

Nafte explains that from a distance, the letters in the piece, The Astronomer's Robe, look like a constellation of stars, but in a close-up view the stars are actually Hebrew and Greek lettering.

In this exhibition, she pays homage to the Jewish scientists of the Middle Ages. She notes that for 900 years, Hebrew was considered to be a scientific language. "Many scientific treatises were translated from Hebrew into Greek and Latin," she says.

The Toronto-based artist – she has studied human anatomy, skeletal biology and forensics – has been working as a full-time artist for more than 20 years. However, in the last 10 years, she has focused on Judaic art.

Raised in an Orthodox family, Nafte, 43, trained in Judaic art with her father, Max Bensabat, a retired commercial artist and a scribe. In 2000, she apprenticed with him to learn how to do halachicly correct Hebrew text.

"My father has been very supportive. He checks all my layouts and he looks for accuracy."

Nafte says she is grateful that her work has been so well received in the United States and Canada, but that means she has a tight work schedule to meet the demand.

"If you don't show, you don't exist. It's like publish or perish. I love being busy.

"My work may be labour intensive, but it is truly a labour of love."

Prayer, is one of the works on display at artist Myriam Nafte's latest show.

To view the works in Nafte's show at Miles Nadal, visit www.myriamnafte.com. For more information about the exhibit call 416-924-6211, ext. 112.

Bestselling memoir recalls Jewish life in pre-WWI England

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Harry Bernstein was 96 years old when his memoir, The Invisible Wall: A Love Story That Broke Barriers (Random House), was published to great critical acclaim two years ago. Last year, he followed up his success with a second memoir, The Dream (Random House), which similarly has attracted much favourable attention and legions of readers.

This year, at 98, he is hard at work on a third book. "I may never make it, but I'll do what I have always done. I will try," he has said

Remembered from his childhood, the period that Bernstein writes of in The Invisible Wall seems so remote to most of us as to be historical, yet his heart-wrenching prose brings it back to vivid life. He was a boy of four at the opening of the story, which is set in the pre-World War I era, and he is about 11 at its conclusion, just before the family was to immigrate to America.

The author with his wife Ruth, 1936

He was the youngest of five children (a sixth is born during the story) in a working-class family in a small mill town near Manchester, England. All the town's Jews live on one side of a small cobbled street, and Gentile families occupy all the houses on the other side. Between them is an invisible wall that regulates their relations and keeps them from getting too friendly with each other, being invited into each others' homes, or – except in rare circumstances – marrying into each others' families.

In dramatically spare prose, Bernstein paints a grimly realistic portrait of his impoverished family, headed by an anti-social drunkard father and a hard-working, heroically suffering mother. He recounts many adult conversations he heard as a young boy and expertly sketches the neighbourhood's leading personalities and landmarks such as schools, pubs, grocery stores and parks.

As young children, he and his brothers and sisters walked to school together to lessen the likelihood of becoming prey for bullies.

Anti-Semitic insults and assaults occur with regrettable frequency in the town and provide an ominous undertone to the story. In one incident, one of his older brothers is granted an interview for a job at a newspaper, then is kept waiting for more than an hour only to be told that no newspaper would ever hire him because he was a Jew.

"I'm doing you a favour telling you this," the man told him. "I'm going to save you a lot of time and trouble writing letters. We're a humanitarian country. We gave you people refuge when no other country would have you. But don't take advantage of it and start pushing yourselves into places where you aren't wanted. Stick to where you belong, in the tailoring shops and pawnshops and the markets. Remember that and you'll be all right."

Bernstein early family portrait

There are two ill-fated love stories in the book and 'arry, as our boy-narrator is usually called, plays a role in each. In the first, he carries notes in milk bottles from a young lady on his side of the street to her gentile beau on the other side, each time receiving a penny for him to spend on candy. When the young lady's parents discover her secret affair, they ship her to Australia. Eventually, her boyfriend joins the army, returns from the war horribly disfigured, and comes to a tragic end, right in front of Harry's eyes.

The second illicit love story occurs much closer to home. When Harry's older sister, Lily, falls in love with a promising young man named Arthur, the pair take great pains to hide their relationship by meeting in secret. Harry discovers them in the midst of a tryst in the park and is sworn to secrecy. But he senses that trouble lies ahead, since his parents have expressly forbidden such relations.

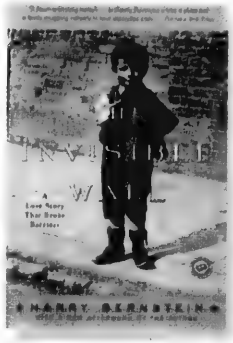
To make matters worse, Lily has rejected the interest shown by the town's young rabbi, a match that would have made her mother proud. When the truth emerges, mother and daughter are torn apart. The author's treatment of these characters is so sensitive and sympathetic that each new twist or revelation tears at the reader's heart as the domestic drama climbs to a crescendo of sadness.

Some readers may see in Bernstein's stark depiction of Jewish life in a provincial town a reflection of Magnolia Street, Louis Golding's 1932 novel of Jewish life in Manchester. That tale also presented a street divided down the middle with the Jews on one side and the gentiles on the other. The bestselling book was later made into a play as well as a motion picture, Magnolia Street Story.

A more current comparison seems equally apt: The Invisible Wall seems to bear strong affinities with Angela's Ashes, Frank McCourt's Pulitzer Prize-winning memoir of a decade ago. Both feature gray skies, a gritty town, grinding poverty, a useless alcoholic father, and a desperate mother whose situation ranges from grim to pathetic. McCourt, whose childhood memoir was set in Limerick, Ireland, during the Depression, followed up that first book with Tis, a memoir of the family's subsequent experiences in the supposed golden land of America.

Likewise, Bernstein has given us The Dream, an account of the family's arrival and early years in America. He is 12 years old when an anonymous benefactor sends the family steamship tickets to make the fabled crossing. In Chicago, where the family is met by relatives, the now-teenage narrator recounts his fascination with modern city life: the skyscrapers, cars and open vistas of Lake Michigan.

Although his happiness is curtailed by an involvement with the Chicago mob and by the lean and mean years of the 1930s, a singular high point for Bernstein was his own love relationship with Ruby, the woman who would become his wife. He became a journalist and script reader for a movie studio, and remained happily married for 67 years, until Ruby's death in 2002.



"What saved me in those terrible days without her was my writing," he explained in an afterword to The Imaginary Wall.

"I turned to it in desperation, seeking something that would take my mind off my loss. And it worked. I found in writing, a therapy that was soothing for the grief that I felt, and I chose a subject that was as far away from the present as I could possibly go: my childhood in England, and that little cobbled street that was divided into two parts, one Christian, one Jewish, and the people on both sides that I remembered so well."

Like Angela's Ashes, The Imaginary Wall will probably make a wonderful movie in the hands of the right producer and director. Hopefully, Bernstein will keep writing, and be allowed to enjoy the fruits of his labours, for some years to come.

Rabbi says women's singing must be 'innocent'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi David Bigman, rosh yeshiva of Yeshivat Ma'ale Gilboa, thoroughly enjoys teaching, but he was a bit puzzled by the high praise he received from an audience member, following a shiur (lesson) he gave in the United States.

"All I did was teach one source," the rabbi said, adding that he didn't realize at first that the man wasn't talking about the content of the lecture.

"He just noticed that I was having fun," Rabbi Bigman said in a phone interview from his home in Israel.

Rabbi David Bigman

"Jewish learning has become very serious work," he said, adding that every rosh yeshiva he ever studied with – among them Rabbi Aaron Soloveitchik – enjoyed what they were doing. "You could see it in their faces, in their body language."

Rabbi Bigman, a 54-year-old Detroit native, who majored in economics at Wayne State University before making aliyah and going on to obtain his smichah at Machon Ariel (the Ariel Institute) in Haifa, will address some serious issues this weekend as a guest speaker for Torah in Motion.

On Saturday night, he will discuss the prohibitions on hearing a woman's voice (kol ishah) at an event being held in a private home.

Last year, Rabbi Bigman – who was the founder of one of the first women's yeshivot in Israel, at Kibbutz Ein Hanitziv – was consulted regarding the halachic acceptability of an Israeli religious school's custom of including female students as singers at ceremonial events. He wrote a responsum on the issue.

The situation at the Israeli school was reminiscent of one that arose in Toronto in 2006 when organizers of the annual community Yom Hashoah service decided – in deference to the city's Orthodox rabbinic organization, the Vaad Harabonim – not to include a mixed boy-girl choir on the program. As a result, the Toronto Board of Rabbis, most of whose members are Conservative and Reform, did not participate in nor endorse the event.

But Rabbi Bigman's responsum "doesn't solve the problem for people who don't accept the tshuvah [answer]," he said.

His responsum takes a "lenient" approach, relying on minority opinions to allow women to sing publicly in front of men under certain conditions.

Rabbi Bigman outlined five criteria that determine whether women's public singing is acceptable: context and appropriate atmosphere, the song's lyrics, the musical style, the singer's attire and body language.

He added that the same criteria would hold true for men singing in front of women, although that situation is not technically a matter of Jewish law.

The responsum states that leniency is permitted "when there is a clear sense that the listening is innocent and the singing is innocent."

As well, Rabbi Bigman told The CJN, there is a tradition of accepting minority opinions when a need arises. In this case, he felt there was a need because some women felt "slighted" by the prohibition on singing publicly, leading to an estrangement from Torah.

The move to the philosophical right in Orthodoxy that has become apparent in recent years, particularly in North America, is "new," said Rabbi Bigman, who was ordained 27 years ago.

"True Halachah is attentive to the needs of people," but that does not mean the law is always pliable, said the rabbi.

Prince of ping-pong hopes for medal

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Sixteen-year-old Mitchell Billinkoff, who has been winning national medals in table tennis since he was 10, said he can't wait for the Maccabiah Games to begin in July.

Billinkoff will be the only Canadian competing in table tennis, and he's hopeful that he can bring home a medal.

"I have been to the North American Maccabi Junior Games three times before and have won a total of five gold medals, two silver and one bronze. The last time in 2007, I won three gold medals for singles, doubles and the team competition," he said.

Back home he's won his share of medals as well. At the Canadian National Junior Championships in 2007, Billinkoff won a silver in the boys 18-and-under team competition and a bronze in doubles with partner Fred Eng. This year, at the same tournament, he won a bronze medal in the boys 18-and-under team competition.

He's also won silver and bronze medals in singles play at the March 2008 STIGA Big Bang tournament in Montreal. He has been a member of the Manitoba provincial table tennis team for the past eight years and trains with provincial coach George Damianov.

Mitchell Billinkoff

Billinkoff began his venture into the sport much like other youngsters. About seven years ago, "I just fooled around playing with my parents in our basement. Then one day, my uncle found a flyer for a table tennis tournament in Manitoba and I entered and came in second in one of the age events. A provincial coach saw me playing and recruited me. When I was nine years old, I started playing for the Manitoba team," he said.

When Billinkoff was only 10, he entered the Canadian National Table Tennis Competition for the first time. "That was 2001 in Laval, [Que.,] and I won a bronze medal for mixed doubles," he said.

Although many people play Ping-Pong for amusement, Billinkoff said when played at a national and international level, the sport is as rigorous as any other. It demands a high degree of physical fitness and mental concentration.

He expects the competition at this summer's Maccabiah Games to be stiff.

"Table tennis is the number 1 sport in China, but there aren't not too many Jewish people in China… But all across Europe, table tennis is very popular, and there could be some very good players. Some of my friends from Australia who play the sport are trying out, so I'm not too sure what to expect," he said.

Billinkoff, a Grade 12 student at Winnipeg's Gray Academy of Jewish Education, said he's training hard.

"I started practising much more in the last couple of years. I practice five times a week for two and a half hours… My coach doesn't recommend that I play other racquet sports, because it might mess up my strokes for table tennis. He's not happy that I play badminton for my school team in the spring."

Named Manitoba Jewish Athlete of the Year in 2007, Billinkoff said he has considered training in China, since "everyone in China plays," but he hasn't gone "because of other commitments."

Having never been to Israel before, Billinkoff said he is especially looking forward to the Games' opening ceremonies. "I can't wait to see the opening Olympic-like ceremonies and [am excited by] the idea of walking into a stadium with thousands of people cheering."

Marilyn Billinkoff, Mitchell's mother, said, "My husband and I are planning to go to Israel to watch the Games. We were both there last when we were in our 20s, so it's time. This is a perfect opportunity."

Billinkoff will be going to Israel for a three-week school trip in May along with the rest of his graduating class, and he plans to take a break from training.

"After that, our idea is to try to have Mitchell stay in Israel until the Games in July," his mom said.

"We'll do that if he can line up accommodation, coaching and training in Israel. We're sure that there are good coaches there."

A proportionate response

By YONI GOLDSTEIN

New Views

Critics of Israel's offensive in Gaza to neutralize the threat of Hamas rockets fired at the southern part of the country love to use the "proportionality" argument. This line of thinking goes as follows: considering that Hamas is merely lobbing inaccurate, small payload rockets, and considering that such rockets have only killed a handful of Israelis, Israel's military answer of precise, tactical air and artillery strikes, which are decimating Hamas' infrastructure and ranks, and are killing some innocent civilians as well, is too much.

You and I suspect that those who play the proportionality card are not out to make a straightforward correlative argument against Israeli aggression. Which is to say, this sort of reasoning is the tactic used exclusively by anti-Zionists and anti-Semites. Look around: no one else – even others opposed to Israel's Gaza campaign for one reason or another – dares utter the word. Indeed, no country at war – in the history of warfare – has been served with the accusation of fighting "disproportionately." Only Israel

To illustrate the sheer ridiculousness of the proportionality offence, let's, for a second, humour those who employ it.

To wit: what would a "proportionate" Israeli response to Hamas rocket attacks look like?

First, Israel would have to start using less explosive shells and bombs. This would make the destructive yield of both sides' weapons even. There would be no more air strikes, either – a proportionate response means exclusively using primitive, often homemade, bombs and unpredictable explosives.

Next, Israel would have to scrap its precision guiding systems. No more laser directives ensuring that missiles land where they should – which is to say, on the storerooms of Hamas rockets and the houses of Hamas terrorists. Losing the guidance systems would also mean that Israel would not be able to warn Palestinian civilians (and even some of the Hamas men it has targeted) to evacuate targeted spots.

This sort of Israeli response – strapping on a blindfold and hurling crude bombs at Gaza – would quite likely inflict more damage on innocent Palestinians than Israel's actual strategy (which puts Israeli soldiers at greater personal risk so as to lessen the risk of Palestinians dying in the crossfire). But at least it would be proportionate, right?

I'll guarantee you this much: if Israel was to adopt the proportionate response I've outlined, those who use the proportion argument would simply find a new way to make the mess in the Middle East the exclusive responsibility of the Jewish state.

Proportionality, we know, has nothing to do with what's going on in southern Israel and Gaza. Nor does it have anything to do with previous battles in Lebanon and the West Bank, or a possible future altercation with a nuclear Iran. It's an excuse to vilify Israel, plain and simple.

What's shameful is that so many – in the media and, more generally, on the centre-right – have taken the bait from proportionality mongers. Everyone should be able to see through such an illogical, nonsensical line of reasoning, yet so many are consciously, and infuriatingly, choosing not to.

So the next time you hear someone spouting off about Israel "disproportionate" response to Hamas' rocket campaign on southern Israel, I would urge you to try a different tack. Instead of talking about Israel's right to respond to an act of war, Hamas' use of human shields, UN conventions regarding the rules of warfare or the fact that Israeli soldiers are more at risk of injury and death due to Israel's humane war strategy, try to play by the proportionate crew's rules.

Paint them a clear picture of just what a proportionate Israeli response might look like: aimless, crude bombs hurtling toward unsuspecting Gaza Palestinians who won't have any time to take cover (and nowhere to hide anyway, because Hamas has neglected to build bomb shelters in Gaza).

We'll see how the proportionate crowd takes to a little of its own medicine.

YUMMY ISRAELI COUSCOUS

- 3 tbsp olive oil
- 1/2 red pepper, finely chopped
- 1 tsp tumeric
- 1 bay leaf
- 1 tbsp chopped mint (15 ml)
- 2-3 c chicken or vegetable stock
- Salt and freshly cracked black pepper, to taste
- 1 small onion, finely diced
- 1 1/2 c Israeli couscous
- 1 cinnamon stick
- Handful of currants, optional

Heat oil in a medium saucepan over medium heat. Saute onions & red pepper until soft but not browned, about 4 minutes. Add turmeric, cinnamon stick, bay leaf and currants. Cook, stirring, until couscous starts to toast, about 2 minutes. Add stock, salt and pepper. Bring to a boil. Cover and reduce heat to low. Cook couscous for 10-12 minutes, or until all liquid is absorbed. Remove from heat. Let stand covered, for 5 minutes. Fluff with a fork before serving. Garnish with chopped mint

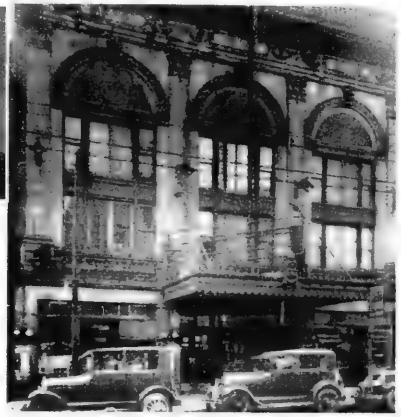
REMEMBERING OUR YESTERDAYS

By BILL GLADSTONE



FILM INDUSTRY PIONEER

A former newsboy from Minneapolis, Nathan L. Nathanson purchased the old Majestic Theatre on Adelaide Street from Ambrose Small and opened it as the Regent, Toronto's first deluxe movie house, in 1916. That was the first in the Famous Players chain of theatres that he and his associates built up across Canada. One of a group of prominent Jewish film-industry pioneers in Toronto, Nathanson was a vice-chairman of the board of the CBC and helped Holy Blossom Temple construct its building in the late 1930s. When he died in 1943, condolences came from the likes of Jack Warner, Charles Boyer, and Abbott and Costello.

Demonstrating behind closed doors

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

Recently, a community rally in support of Israel was held indoors, at Beth Tzedec Congregation. Similarly, rallies, also in and around Jewish institutions, took place in Halifax, Montreal, Vancouver and Winnipeg.

Yet when one looks around the world at pro-Israel rallies since the incursion into Gaza, the vast majority of them outside Canada were held outdoors, and open to the public.

More than 10,000 Jews and non-Jews gathered on 42nd Street in New York outside the Israeli consulate recently to show their support for the Gaza offensive. Thousands more pro-Israel demonstrators rallied across cities in Europe, including Prague, Dublin, Antwerp and Berlin. Twenty thousand people participated in the London demonstration, which took place in Trafalgar Square.

Despite the fact that venomous anti-Israel groups stood metres away from Jews, yelling vicious epithets, Diaspora communities outside of Canada stood, firmly and heroically, displaying their support for Israel.

I asked Bernie Farber, the CEO of the Canadian Jewish Congress, which was involved in organizing the Toronto rally, why it is that we hide away in fear when demonstrating in favour of our homeland Israel.

Bernie said, "I don't think we should take the fact that we chose to demonstrate civilly and not demonize our neighbours as fear. Instead, we demonstrated according to Canadian values – sensitively, with understanding and compassion."

He added, "I don't think that taking to the street gives expression to bravery and courage. One can demonstrate in all kind of ways and besides, nobody had negated an outdoor rally."

While Bernie is right that Canadians in general, and more specifically the Jewish community, are and have always been sensitive and decent folk, we were also once a more mighty community, willing to pile into the streets fighting for the release of Soviet Jewry.

I believe that over the years we have indeed become fearful, and if you ask our leaders why we are holding our demonstrations – or perhaps better called "events" – indoors, they will tell you they are afraid of somebody getting hurt, God forbid.

While I certainly appreciate and understand this fear, I would say that there are ways and means of controlling a rally so that injuries do not occur or are minimized through the fine work of our very capable police force and Jewish community security.

Further, and more importantly, the way in which we hide away from our adversaries is clear and evident to the anti-Israel camp. When 1,500 Hamas supporters hold a rally in downtown Toronto and 50 Jews, mostly Israelis, are waving flags across the street, our enemies are encouraged in their fight.

This war should end in its right time. Until it does, however, the Jewish community of Toronto and Canada needs to encourage our Israeli brothers and sisters to be brave in Ashkelon, Sderot and the corridors of Gaza City, as well as expressing that same Jewish bravery in the outdoors of Toronto, Vancouver, Winnipeg, Montreal and Halifax.

We need to do this for our own self-esteem, to allow thousands of non-Jews to demonstrate with us, and and to prove to Israel that Diaspora Jewry has the ability to stand eye-to-eye with our enemies right here in Toronto. If we do not let the Jewish community publicly sing Am Yisrael Chai at the top of our lungs, one voice braided with the next, then in fact we are appearing to be ashamed.

Kol hakavod to our community leaders for coordinating a pro-Israel rally. Next time, however, let us strengthen our determination by showing the world openly that Canadian Jews are honourable and fearless because of our love of Israel, God and what is just.

War for Israel's image is a CLIC away

Online initiative aims to fight negative portrayals in media

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

The keyboard is mightier than the sword and may just help Israel win the PR war.

So insists Amir Gissin, Israel's consul general for Toronto and Western Canada.

In an open letter to the community sent Jan. 15, Gissin urged Canadians sympathetic to Israel's plight to get on the "new media" battlefield in support of the Jewish state.

At the crest of the Gaza-Israel conflict, Gissin's letter, titled "This time it's personal," called on community members who are "frustrated or concerned with the portrayal of Israel in Canadian news and with biased depictions" to make their voices heard by engaging in letter-writing campaigns to news outlets across the country by endorsing a new online initiative – the Canadian Light on Israel Coverage (CLIC).

"You're not alone," Gissin wrote. "Ten thousand voices like yours can respond every day: praise, protest, inform and correct on leading Canadian news websites, in real time, effectively."

CLIC was created as a digital grassroots tool by a group of five local, volunteer, pro-Israel, self-described "media watchers" led by Paul Ross, an Irish-Israeli Jew residing in Toronto who approached Gissin with the idea during the height of the recent Israel-Gaza conflict.

People interested in sharing pro-Israel sentiment with the Canadian media should register with CLIC by sending in their e-mail address to todaysCLIC@gmail.com, Ross told The CJN in an interview last week.

Gissin said that by engaging in this virtual war of words, everyday Canadian citizens who support Israel's struggle for peace and security can "make a huge difference by illuminating Israel's position in Canadian media" and ensure fair and balanced coverage of the situation in both Gaza and Israel.

Amir Gissin

The consul general's letter also asked that like-minded community members pass on his message and CLIC's e-mail address, in order to achieve maximum dissemination.

Ross said CLIC is not affiliated with any Jewish community organization, nor is it in the employ of the Israeli consulate.

He said that while the war in Gaza may be over, the gruesome images coming out of the territory are effectively lowering public opinion of Israel.

The scenes are "horrible" he said, adding that "those [Gazans] who've died and been affected because of [Hamas]… I'm the last person who enjoys a war. I'm not a warmonger, but Israel did what it had to. And now – when public opinion has dropped even lower – is the time [CLIC] can really make a difference. Israel is still a hot issue."

On Jan. 20, those registered with CLIC started receiving a once-daily media alert consisting of "a salient Canadian story or news item related to Israel, coupled with a call to action requiring just a minute or two of your time," Gissin wrote.

CLIC's inaugural e-mail-out linked readers to a Jan. 19 op-ed in the Toronto Sun written by Canadian Union of Public Employees Ontario president, Sid Ryan, in which he defended himself against what he called "a new form of McCarthyism" being waged against him by defenders of Israel.

Jewish adoptee finds biological brother

Bernie Shiner

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

When Bernie Shiner filed a form in 2007 with Health Canada in hopes of obtaining his medical history, he never imagined he'd learn he had a brother.

"Whatever hair I may have on my body stood up," said Shiner, a 58-year-old insurance broker with First Service Brokers.

Until last summer, Shiner was sure he was an only child.

Having been adopted by a Jewish couple in Toronto when he was four years old, Shiner was told his biological mother had died in a car accident and his father was unable to care for him.

Without any cause to question the story, Shiner was happy to grow up in the Forest Hill area of Toronto and embraced his Jewish upbringing.

He never could have known that just a few kilometres away in the Bathurst Manor area of Toronto, his little brother, David Goodman, 53, had also been given up by the same woman, adopted by a Jewish couple, and raised as an only child.

As Shiner grew older and developed health issues that come with age, he decided to apply to Health Canada for his medical history.

"I filled out the application form online and you send it off, and they tell you that it takes a good six months to get a response," Shiner said.

"So closer to eights months later, I received a letter. Basically, the letter stipulated that there was no medical history they were aware of, but that I have a brother. I was sort of standing there looking at it and saying, 'Let me read this again,'" he said with a laugh.

The News in Brief

Canada

Hate Denounced

OTTAWA — A prominent Muslim group came out against "anti-Semitic language" heard at rallies to protest Israel's actions in Gaza. In a statement earlier this month, the Canadian Council on American-Islamic Relations said that while it respects the right to free speech, it "categorically condemned the anti-Semitic language used by protesters at recent rallies against Israel's ongoing assault against Gaza."

Educating Christians

TORONTO — The Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies (FSWC) last week teamed with International Christian Embassy Jerusalem–Canada, an evangelical group, to hold a workshop for young Christian adults on "contemporary Holocaust issues" and "the history of Israel." The seminar took place Jan. 21 in Toronto.

Iran Slams Canada

TEHRAN — The Iranian foreign ministry summoned Canada's chargé d'affaires in Tehran "to voice Iran's strongly worded protest over the country's support for the Zionists' crimes and atrocities in Gaza," Iran's official news agency reported. The Islamic Republic News agency said James Carrick was formally rebuked Jan. 20 in response to Canada's recent vote against a UN Human Rights Council resolution condemning Israel's actions in Gaza. The foreign ministry accused Canada of "double standards and selective approach in dealing with human rights."

Starbucks Attacked

LONDON — Calls to boycott Starbucks, based on false claims that the company helped finance Israel's military operation in Gaza, led to violent attacks on two of its cafés in London. The boycott calls have been circulating by e-mail and text message with the claim that Starbucks and McDonald's were donating two weeks' revenues to Israel. On Jan. 17, during an anti-Israel rally in London's Trafalgar Square, rapper Lowkey attacked firms, including Starbucks, that he said have Zionist links. After the rally, two groups of a few dozen people each smashed the windows of two Starbucks cafés and looted the shops.

Bomb Left At Shul

FLORENCE — A rudimentary explosive device was found at the entrance of the Chabad House in Florence. The device, constructed from a small camping gas canister, was discovered during the day Jan. 17, but not reported to police until Saturday night after Shabbat. The Chabad House is located half a block from the city's main synagogue. Reports said a paper fuse had been lit, but it burned out and no damage occurred. Tensions are high in Italy over Israel's Gaza operation, with thousands attending an anti-Israel rally in Rome on Jan. 17.

Rabbi Criticized for Role in Prayer Service

NEW YORK — The main modern Orthodox rabbinical association says a prominent member violated its rules by participating in the National Prayer Service.

A Rabbinical Council of America (RCA) official told JTA that Rabbi Haskel Lookstein, spiritual leader of Congregation Kehilath Jeshurun in New York City, broke the group's longstanding rules by participating in the service Jan 23 at the National Cathedral on the morning after U.S. President Barack Obama's inauguration.

The RCA said that "participation in a prayer service held in the sanctuary of a church is prohibited. Any member of the RCA who attends such a service does so in contravention of this policy and should not be perceived as representing the organization in any capacity."

The group isn't seeking to sanction the rabbi, a source familiar with the case said, but, the source added, any RCA member can suggest that another member be brought before a disciplinary board for violating rules.

Rabbi Lookstein joined six representatives of various religious groups, including from Reform and Conservative Judaism, in reciting portions of a non-denominational prayer. Most of the service was non-sectarian, but there were a few Christian references.

Rabbi Lookstein said that "the people who spoke to me about it indicated it was an important contribution to the Orthodox community, because it is only right for the Orthodox community to be supporting the president in a visible way when he is being supported by representatives of the Conservative and Reform movements."

The (high) cost of living Jewishly

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Special Report

Anybody who shops for groceries is well aware that there's a premium attached to kosher food.

At one midtown grocery store, kosher lean ground beef was nearly twice the cost of the non-kosher variety, while kosher chicken nuggets were more than double the price of an equivalent non-kosher brand, and strawberry yogurt in the kosher section was almost 100 per cent more costly than the non-kosher brand only a few aisles away.

Over the course of a year for a family of four, that can add up, but it's likely not even the biggest premium that a Jewish lifestyle will exact.

Add on tuition fees at Jewish day schools, which start in the $10,000 to $11,000 range in kindergarten and soar to more than $18,000 for high school, then factor in Jewish summer camps, synagogue memberships, trips to Israel, club/organization memberships and donations to Jewish charities, and it starts to look like being fully involved in Jewish life is something limited to families earning at least six figures.

One researcher in the United States has put a dollar figure on the cost of living Jewishly. Gerald Bubis, vice president and fellow at the Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs and adjunct professor of social work at the University of Southern California, determined in 2002 that for a family with two children in day school, the economic cost for Jewish services would range between $25,000 to $35,000 (US) per year.

Given that the median income for American Jewish households at the time was $50,000, "it is clear that this figure is untenable," he wrote. "Indeed, it is unlikely that households whose gross incomes are under $125,000 could manage to spend 25 per cent to 30 per cent of their gross income on Jewish services. After all, most families pay a mortgage, save for college, drive cars, give to other charities and even choose to go to concerts, take vacations, subscribe to magazines and the like."

Bubis reported his findings in a report titled The Costs of Jewish Living: Revisiting Jewish Involvement and Barriers, published under the auspices of the William Petschek National Jewish Family Center of the American Jewish Committee. The $30,000 average cost included $1,100 for synagogue dues, $22,000 for two children in day school, $1,200 for day camp for two kids, $5,000 for sleepaway camp for two children, JCC dues and a federation gift of $200. Sending children to supplementary Jewish schools could substantially cut into that cost, bringing it down to the $5,000 to $8,000 range, he stated.

In a telephone interview from Los Angeles, Bubis said Canadian and American Jewish households share the same concerns about assimilation and continuity – and the cost of services that address them – although the process of assimilation is more advanced in the United States, largely because Canadian Jews are one or two generations closer to their European roots.

A native of Winnipeg who has lived most of his life in the United States, Bubis said for a Jewish family to enjoy various institutional offerings – everything from a day school education to summer camp – would now require incomes of $130,000 to $150,000 (US).

The median income for American Jewish households is currently (prior to the economic meltdown) $80,000 (US).

In Toronto, UJA Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto has recognized that parents who enrol their children in Jewish day schools are making a financial sacrifice.

"That's why we provide tuition subsidies of nearly $8 million annually to parents who can't afford full fees," said spokesperson Howard English. "No other North American Federation subsidizes tuitions to this extent. In addition, UJA Federation is matching a $1 million grant from Henry and

A historic inauguration

From the editor's desk...

Whatever inscription the presidency of Barack Obama leaves one day, either in those proverbial "dusty" pages of history or in Google's virtual pages, most people of our generation will be able to recall where we were for his inauguration on Jan. 20, 2009.

Most of us, of course, watched the administration of the presidential oath and Obama's inaugural address on television from a comfortable place at home or at work. Many people across Canada gathered at special assembly points, to view the proceedings among a large group.

But literally millions of people, as we saw, among them many Canadians, made a pilgrimage-like trip to Washington, to be there, "witnesses" to a historic moment, "witnesses" many of them also hoped, to a turning point in American history, if not world history as well.

I do not wish to overstate the case, but a palpable Obama phenomenon had clearly taken hold in America even from before the Nov. 4 election results. Except among the sourest and dourest of Republicans and hard-core white supremacist curmudgeons, the people of the United States had boarded their own sort of "freedom train" to a new land of optimism and hope.

The phenomenon culminated in the emotional celebratory scene in Washington of vast humanity standing and dancing in very cold temperatures along the Mall and Pennsylvania Avenue.

To be sure, the euphoria has already died down a great deal. America has settled into the new norm of being governed by a new, younger chief executive. But being the chief executive means making chief executive decisions. And each decision brings its disappointments.

But last Tuesday was a day bristling with significance that was universally understood and universally acknowledged. Understanding the historic uniqueness of the occasion, Israel's President Shimon Peres, just hours before the inauguration, from half a world away, issued a special congratulatory statement to mark the moment.

The following are excerpts from Peres' statement.

"Today is a great day not only for the United States of America, but for the entire world…

"I pray here in Jerusalem that Barack Obama will be a great president of the United States. If he will be a great president of the United States, he will serve all humankind, all nations and all persons because to be a great American president today means to struggle for peace, to fight terror, to correct the environment and to offer the young generation a better future.

"It is a great day for the United States because… only 10 years ago, [his election] would have been unimaginable. From now on, all of us have the right to be different and equal… We don't have to apologize [for our differences] and we don't have to divide humanity between inferior and superior.

"I want, on behalf of the people of Israel… to tell the president, 'God bless you.'

"Your success will be our success. Your hope will become a reality. We should continue to dream to make the world move ahead further, better and peacefully."

Peres' effusively excited good wishes were typical of most of the messages that flowed to Washington last week.

President Obama's inaugural address, however, did not soar as high as some of candidate Obama's speeches. But that was no doubt intentional. For President Obama has a wider domestic constituency to appease than did candidate Obama. And his speeches must now hug a terrain that is closer to the meeting point of both constituencies.

But still, the speech did reach a number of high points, and the newly-sworn-in President Obama made certain to emphasize a number of key assertions and beliefs.

He rejected the notion that western society – materialistic, acquisitive, democratic, entrepreneurial, free and only partially God-fearing – is the root cause for terrorism directed against it.

"We will not apologize for our way of life, nor will we waver in its defence, and for those who seek to advance their aims by inducing terror and slaughtering innocents, we say to you now that our spirit is stronger and cannot be broken; you cannot outlast us, and we will defeat you."

He also spoke firmly but invitingly to the various Third World nations who are interested in establishing new, better relations with the United States and with the West.

"To the Muslim world, we seek a new way forward based on mutual interest and mutual respect. To those leaders around the globe who seek to sow conflict or blame their society's ills on the West: know that our people will judge you on what you build, not on what you destroy. To those who cling to power through corruption and deceit and the silencing of dissent: know that you are on the wrong side of history, but that we will extend a hand if you are willing to unclench your fist."

In all, the inauguration of Barack Obama as the 44th president of the United States was a moment to savour, a springboard for the high vaulting of emotions and hopes, dreams and possibilities.

Israelis pitch innovations to Canadian investors

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

For two days next week, Canadian investors and government representatives will rub elbows with academics, scientists and businesspeople from Israel in an event that organizers hope will one day spin off into profitable commercial enterprises.

The "Lab-to-Market" symposium is touted as matching "Israeli innovation to Canadian know-how" and will bring together representatives "from Israel's most prominent university in the area of research and development [Tel Aviv University]... to showcase and expose leading technologies and opportunities to the Canadian market."

It will run on Feb. 3 and Feb. 4, first at the Intercontinental Hotel, and on the second day at the Toronto Stock Exchange (TSX).

Sheldon Potter, incoming president of Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University (TAU), believes the event will be a "win-win" for participants from both sides, with Canadian capital and know-how helping commercialize Israeli technical and medical innovations.

"Canada is behind [Israel] in commercializing innovation," he said. "Canada could certainly use our innovation out of Israel."

A lawyer with Fogler, Rubinoff LLP, Potter said "our firm is working with Israeli companies. We see the opportunity for sure," although Canadian commercial involvement with the university is still in its early stages.

TAU is a source of numerous technological innovations, but it's not particularly well known in Toronto, he said. "It is a very large research university, with involvement in everything from solar energy, to nanotechnology to life science." Researchers at TAU are also heavily into military applications.

Among the TAU speakers to address the symposium will be Ilana Gozes, who will discuss research in developing a medication to reverse memory loss for Alzheimer's patients; Udi Gazit, who will describe research into nanotechnology; Amihay Freeman, who will present developments in employing natural enzymes to heal wounds, and Avi Seifert, who will present information on a device to reduce fuel emissions on trucks.

Janis Koyanagi, director of business development strategy for the TSX and the TSX Venture Exchange, said "our interest is to promote business connections between Canada and Israel. We see a great benefit. We see technological development in Israel and we can see it financed by Canadian investors.

"We believe our capital markets are well positioned to take it to the commercial stage."

The TSX operates two programs that provide investment capital to up-and-coming corporations. Either could be of use to investors seeking to turn Israeli technological breakthroughs into commercial applications, she said.

With its reputation for technical achievements, Israel is on the TSX's radar as part of the exchange's efforts to attract foreign corporations. One of her colleagues, Raymond King, visits the Jewish state twice a year, Koyanagi said.

The TSX is also influenced by the private sector's interest in Israel. "When we see the investment banking community and the legal community in Canada selling Israel, then there's a chance for growth in Israel," she added.

Potter said despite the recent conflict in Gaza, business in Israel is proceeding as usual and "out of the dozens of calls to get people to the event, only one person raised the security question."

The symposium is co-sponsored by, among others, Canadian Friends of TAU, Fogler, Rubinoff LLP, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, the Toronto Atmospheric Fund, the TSX and the TSX Venture Exchange.

TORAH DEDICATED: A Torah scroll painted by Israeli artist Michal Moren was recently dedicated at Chabad-Lubavitch of Markham. The Torah was donated by Colin and Joy Shapiro, in memory of Colin Shapiro's parents. The congregation's Rabbi Avraham Plotkin thanked the Shapiro family and explained that the illustrated Torah will enhance the synagogue, as families will be able to see the Torah portion in a visual, hands-on way. Seen at the dedication, attended by more than 150 guests, are, from left, Zoe, Colin, Joy and Mahlah Shapiro.

Brothers share a number of personality traits

Goodman, formerly a pharmaceutical representative and now a golf instructor and owner of Swing Easy School of Golf, had registered with the program in 1990 in hopes of finding his biological family.

"But then I wasn't registered, so he was never going to find me. If I hadn't registered and he hadn't registered, we never would have found each other," Shiner said.

In the letter, Goodman's name, address and phone number was provided.

"When I saw the letter and I'm standing there, I was numb and I immediately wanted to call somebody."

He said he couldn't get a hold of his wife, so he called his oldest son, Joey.

"I said, 'Joey, you're not going to believe this, but you have an uncle.' So, he said, 'Yeah, Uncle Isaac." [Shiner's wife's brother-in-law]. And I said, 'No, no, no. A blood uncle.'"

Shiner said he didn't think twice about calling the number provided in the letter, but the contact information was outdated.

After calling 411 and searching the Internet to no avail, Shiner picked up a phone book.

"There was one David Goodman and everything below it was a D. Goodman. So I called the David Goodman and it was him. First shot. First call. It was bashert. Meant to be."

He said he could tell that his brother was apprehensive about the call.

"I mean, 18 years later, some idiot calls and says, 'Hi, I'm your brother.' But I made it very calming for him and I said, 'Look, you do whatever checks you need to do.'"

Three weeks later, Shiner and Goodman scheduled a meeting.

"He comes walking up and I look at him and he looks at me and he says, 'You have blue eyes.' I said, 'You've got brown.' He said, 'You've got hair. I said, 'You don't,'" Shiner recalled, laughing.

"We both started to laugh because we have absolutely nothing in common other than our height and that was it. We spent four hours at a Tim Horton's that night."

David Goodman

He said that despite the physical differences, there does seem to be a few similarities in their personalities.

"How shall I say this? We can both work a room. He is very social. He likes to feel he's humorous," Shiner said with a laugh.

But they still have so much to learn about each other, he said.

"It's like going out with a new girlfriend. You slowly get to learn about each other and we talk at least twice a week... We are definitely developing a friendship."

Although Shiner understands that adoptees don't always experience the same happy ending he has, he hopes his story will encourage people not to fear reaching their biological family.

"If you're ever confronted with this situation, don't hesitate to call because if you don't call you may be missing out on something that you could enjoy for whatever length of time it will be," he said.

"If it doesn't work out, nothing lost, nothing gained. You didn't have the person before, you don't have them now."

He said that since their first meeting less than a year ago, Goodman, his two children and his father have come over numerous times for Shabbat dinners, and Shiner, his wife and three kids have been invited to his place where he's been introduced to his friends.

"Just about every friend that he has introduced me to, I've had a connection with somehow, except him. The two of us cannot find any connection whatsoever," he said.

"It's just so funny that we have not yet found a connection. But we have blood."

Federation allocates $14M per year to education

Julia Koschitzky to Toronto day schools, providing an additional $2 million to the day school system. The amount that a school receives is based on the number of subsidized students enrolled at the school."

Altogether, federation commits $14 million per year to education, "the largest allocation of any North American Jewish federation," English said. That "signifies a deep commitment to assisting day school parents, an incentive for parents to choose a Jewish education for their children and an investment in a thriving future for our Jewish community. The funds that we have set aside for Jewish education represent roughly 35 per cent of our domestic allocations. It's the largest single domestic allocation in our budget.

"The connection between Jewish education, Jewish identification and involvement in Jewish life is indisputable. Jewish education anchors a healthy Jewish community," he said.

In his U.S. research, Bubis found that only about 25 per cent of higher income families send their children to day schools, and fewer than 10 per cent in all income brackets attend day schools. Fewer than 10 per cent of children attend Jewish-sponsored camps.

While the full panoply of services is out of the price range of the median-income family, "of those who can afford it, most choose not to use those services," he said. "If they choose private school, they choose a non-Jewish private school."

Bubis agreed that affordability is a problem for many families, but subsidies aimed at correcting that create their own problems. If the number of children increased thanks to community allocations, that would mean a greater need for buildings, staff and other infrastructure investments, making the cost balloon even more, he said.

"It's a very complicated issue," he added.

Bubis suggested another way of looking at continuity and Jewish identity besides cost. As he sees it, it comes down to determining whether the community wants to promote Jewish knowledge – the ability to parse text, analyze commentaries and speak Hebrew – or promote Jewish identity – the identification with the Jewish people, history, culture and Israel.

Many of the "external appurtenances" of Jewish life are not particularly expensive, he said.

Jewish artwork, mezuzahs on doors, Jewish books, magazines and newspapers are within reach of most families. Parents concerned about instilling a Jewish identity, if not Jewish knowledge, can do so outside the day school system, he suggested. There are youth groups, camp experiences, trips to Israel, supper table talk, marking events in the Jewish calendar, that are much less costly.

Subsidies can create their own problem

But, based on his study of American Jews, "with all the availability of these less expensive things, most Jews don't take advantage of it," Bubis said.

Even for the most expensive item, the relatively low participation numbers in day schools point to a lack of interest more than affordability. "Of those who can afford it, most choose not to use those services. If they choose private school, they'll choose a non-Jewish private school," he said. "People make choices not connected with money."

Rabbi Charles Grysman, spiritual leader of Zichron Yisroel Congregation of Associated Hebrew Schools, agrees with Bubis, up to a point. Rabbi Grysman, who is also a native Winnipegger said, "I have encountered people who have chosen not to give their children a Jewish education because it related to issues of lifestyle. Sometimes it's not affordable... For some, it's lower on the priority list," he said.

"The financial stress in Toronto is 10 times greater than anywhere else," he added, pointing to the absence of government funding for religious schools.

Rabbi Grysman noted that some who might qualify for a community subsidy cringe at the thought of having their entire financial situation picked over with a fine-toothed comb. Some see it as a kind of "humiliation."

But even on the less-costly aspects of Jewish life, such as eating kosher food, he said he has found that "peripherally identified Jews will forego kashrut because of costs."

In the end, it's "an issue of priorities," he said.

While the U.S. and Canadian situations are different, Bubis said Canada will soon emulate the American experience.

Focusing on making a Jewish lifestyle "a desirable choice for those who can afford it" is key for the community, along with helping those who can't afford it, he added.

"Everybody today is a Jew by choice," Rabbi Grysman said. If the key issue is one of continuity and identification, these can be addressed in new ways that appeal to today's young people. Jewish television shows [his son is involved with the Jewish Television Network, a non-profit, Los Angeles-based multimedia provider], music and literature are ways of building that identity, while employing new technology such as e-mail, Facebook and other Internet applications are ways of delivering it, he said.

A lecture series at the local JCC can attract perhaps 400 people. On the Web, thousands could tune in. In the United States, more than 20 million people watched a PBS show that featured prominent American Jews talking about being Jewish and dealing with the temptations of assimilation. The Jewish Television Network's programs are carried by more than 90 PBS affiliates nationwide and reach 80 million American homes.

"Until the Jewish community tries new technology, using old tools for the new world won't work," Rabbi Grysman said. "Unless the new ways are used, it won't resonate with young people."

Abbas at a crossroads

A week and a few days after the shooting in and from Gaza stopped, a large murky cloud still hovers over the area. Egypt is spearheading the effort to mediate details of a quasi-formal truce between Israel and Hamas. But as of this writing, there is little progress to report. Hamas is preoccupied with other, more compelling priorities.

First, it continued with its viciously violent campaign against Fatah sympathizers, beating, torturing and executing scores of individuals whom they accused of having collaborated with the Israelis. It was a convenient pretext for simply removing their potential opposition.

Second, it mobilized the full force of its considerable propaganda apparatus to wage a two-front war against the Jewish state in the image-rich battleground of public relations: Hamas led a tour of mostly western journalists to some tunnels still operating under the Egyptian border. The photo-op enabled the terrorist leaders to boast that they had not been defeated by the Israelis. It also allowed them to publicly embarrass, if not deride, Egypt, the European Union and the United States, which have all pledged to help bring about an end to arms smuggling there.

Hamas also let loose its barrage of war crimes allegations against Israel. In this effort, ironically and sadly, the terrorist organization is aided by a large cadre of international accusers who enthusiastically and obsessively join in hurling this particularly odious invective at the Jewish state.

Hamas apparently also refused to allow Mahmoud Abbas' Palestinian Authority to man the checkpoint at the Rafah border crossing, one of the key conditions sought both by the Egyptians and the United States. Moreover, and far more telling, Osama Hamdan, Hamas' representative in Lebanon said on Sunday that the Fatah movement must end its talks with Israel if it wishes to reconcile with Hamas.

According to Ha'aretz, Hamdan, a close ally of Hamas political leader Khaled Meshal, said that the group welcomed dialogue with the Abbas-led Fatah, but any reconciliation should be based on a resistance program to "liberate territory and regain rights." He also demanded that the PA end security co-ordination with Israel, since, he maintained, the Israeli-Palestinian peace process has ended.

Hamdan reportedly said that Fatah must issue "a clear and frank declaration to stop security co-ordination with the [Israeli] occupation, release [Hamas] prisoners and later end negotiations [with Israel], because the peace process is irreversibly over. It's time for us to talk about a reconciliation based on a resistance program to liberate the [occupied] territory and regain rights," he added.

The blunt speaking by Hamas leaders is a deeply piercing provocation to the western countries that are scrambling to bring some sense of order, some sense of peace to the Hamas-driven chaos of Gaza. But Hamdan's thrust cuts deepest into Abbas. The Fatah leader is clearly at a crossroads. He must choose – finally, definitively and unambiguously – between permanent Palestinian statelessness alongside Hamas' hateful national program, or the possibility of Palestinian statehood and a prosperous future without them.

Outdoor pro-Israel rally attracts 1,000

As organizers of a successful pro-Israel student rally on Jan. 18 at Dundas Square in downtown Toronto, we were surprised to read Avrum Rosensweig's column ("Demonstrating behind closed doors) in the Jan. 22 edition of The CJN, in which he called for an outdoor gathering on Israel's behalf.

The Toronto rally for Israel, which attracted 1,000 people on a cold, snowy afternoon, was organized by a coalition of student groups – the Canadian Centre for Israel Activism, Hasbara Fellowships and Hillel of Greater Toronto. It was endorsed by major community organizations, including UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, B'nai Brith Canada and Aish HaTorah, for the specific purpose of getting Israel's message out on the street.

Many of the same students who came to Dundas Square joined 5,000 people at the Beth Tzedec Congregation rally on Jan. 8, where they were certainly not left with the impression of fear motivating the choice of location. The Beth Tzedec rally was an admirable reflection of our Jewish community's remarkable solidarity, and that of many non-Jews, with the people of Israel.

Orthodox cherish fellow Jews

Leaving aside Reform Rabbi Dow Marmur's clearly visceral distaste for haredim – those Jews who "wear black hats and sheitels" and whose religious standards he considers "warped" – he propagates a myth, though, about Orthodox Jews that is every bit as imagined and incendiary as the Protocols of the Learned Elders of Zion is about all Jews ("Say no to the haredim!" CJN, Dec. 18).

Haredim, he implies, do not regard non-Orthodox Jews as Jews. That, of course, is nonsense. And his sly addition of the word "necessarily" before "not" [in the sentence, "Non-Orthodox Jews may be good for giving money, but not necessarily for being regarded as Jews."] is a fig leaf that does little to cover his naked bigotry.

What haredim – and all Jews who respect Halachah and its decisors – do not, and indeed cannot, accept are conversions that do not meet the most essential requirements mandated by Jewish law.

For that sin (in Rabbi Marmur's eyes), we haredim are "ruthlessly rigid," and see other Jews as good only "for giving money."

If the rabbi can tame his wrath, he might gain some perspective by imagining a scenario in which a country's medical experts seeks to ensure that the government provides appropriate treatment to citizens, but are assailed by various proponents of "alternative medicine" like "visualization" for cancer and garlic and lemon for AIDS. Shall the doctors, in the interest of "liberalism," embrace the "non-traditional standards" of the "progressive" newcomers?

Halachah may not be meaningful to the Reform movement, but it remains deeply so to countless Orthodox Jews, and with most "traditional" Jews in Israel who respect the Jewish religious tradition, even if they are not personally fully observant

No, Rabbi Marmur, we Orthodox cherish all our fellow Jews. But we cherish, too, the Divine mandate to which all of us are heir. Please don't deride us for that.

Condemns large section of community

I was quite surprised to read Rabbi Dow Marmur of the Reform movement denounce haredi Jews in The CJN ("Say no to the haredim!" Dec. 18).

Rabbi Marmur is condemning a large segment of the Jewish community with his vindictive words. Instead of trying to build bridges, he adds fuel to the fire. He writes that "non-Orthodox Jews may be good for giving money, but not necessarily for being regarded as Jews." In this, he is being disingenuous, as it is non-Orthodox converts who are not converted according to Halachah who are not accepted by Orthodox Judaism.

Rabbi Marmur writes: "I've no problem with haredim who set standards for themselves and each other, however warped I may consider them to be." This unfortunate use of words shows his animosity and condescending attitude.

Our sages say that the Second Temple was destroyed because of sinat chinam, baseless hatred among Jews. May we practice only ahavat chinam, loving our fellow Jew without preconditions, so that we merit to see the Third Temple in all its glory with the coming of the Mashiach and the Final Redemption!

Needed: deep historical thinking

By YEHEZKEL DROR
Special to The CJN

One of Israel's greatest weaknesses in the past few years has been its inability to engage in multi-dimensional thinking of the kind anchored in an understanding that immediate events are the result of historical processes. At the same time, it has a tendency to focus on clearly visible phenomena without delving deeper.

The 2005 withdrawal from Gaza is an example of this. Had the disengagement been accompanied by the creation of public-works projects that would have provided a basic income to any resident of Gaza willing to work, an income clearly conditional upon the absence of hostile actions against Israel – the outcome would have been different. At the same, had first-rate resettlement assistance been extended to the Israeli families forced to leave Gaza, it would have made any future evacuation of territory easier to carry out.

Thinking-in-history, as required, leads to five insights:

1. The establishment of the State of Israel is a historic metamorphosis that constituted a shock to Islam. Arab-Muslim adjustment to this development is a long process and will continue for at least another generation or two.
2. Tensions within Islam, rooted in the difficulty of reconciling tradition with modernity, are creating regional instability, which can be expected to last at least until the end of the century, and will be accompanied by internal conflicts and aggression against the "representatives of modernity."
3. Simultaneously, there is a rise in the power of Islamic actors, due to energy resources in their hands, growing Islamic communities in the West, the proliferation of arms (including weapons of mass destruction), and worldwide geo-strategic shifts.
4. It is impossible for Israel to dominate a large Palestinian population for long. Ignoring this fact is the biggest mistake Israel has made since statehood, and it has placed us in a historical trap of our own making.
5. No agreement between Israel and either the Palestinians or Syria will be stable if not anchored in a comprehensive regional arrangement, supported by Islamic countries and world powers, and backed up by Israeli deterrence that threatens disproportional punishment of violations.

In light of the above, Israel must take its statesmanship to a new level, while advancing on two connected axes: promoting peace as part of a comprehensive Middle East agreement and creating a deterrence that will be adequate against fanatic actors armed with weapons of mass murder. One might call it a "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde" stance, that is, a purposeful bipolarity. On the one hand, there must be a willingness to make far-reaching concessions and offer good neighbourly relations in exchange for a warm, stable peace, and on the other, there has to be a willingness and clear ability to respond disproportionately to any aggression.

The Arab Peace Initiative, with all its problems, provides a basis for an agreement that would include the moderate Arab countries in the wider context of the Islamic states and global powers. It would be based on the common interest of the rulers of the moderate Arab states, most of the world's powers and Israel in stabilizing the Middle East while promoting economic development and modernization.

This requires a number of policy innovations. Thus, the United States should abandon "democratization" as a policy until conditions change, since in the absence of appropriate socio-economic development, it is a recipe for extremism.

The proposed perspective should lead Israel to four conclusions:

- First, progress in the negotiations with the Palestinians and Syria must be combined with a normalization of Israel's relations with most of the Arab and Islamic countries. Israel should not give up assets or agree, for example, to joint sovereignty over parts of Jerusalem, in exchange for agreements with the Palestinians and Syria alone. Nor can the refugee problem be solved, except in a comprehensive Middle Eastern context.
- Second, Israel must take strong deterrent action against anyone who inflicts harm on it, but it should – as much as possible – do so with the silent agreement of moderate Arab forces, and in a way that minimizes civilian casualties and similar hate-engendering damage.
- Third, because there is no guarantee that a comprehensive peace process will succeed, Israel must craft policies enabling it to thrive, even in the absence of peace and despite a series of conflicts. Such a successful policy also improves the probability of obtaining and stabilizing a Middle Eastern agreement, since it undermines hopes of wearing Israel down in stages.
- Fourth, and as a condition for all the rest, Israel must distinguish between what is important for shaping the future and short-term accomplishments. For example, while full recognition of the State of Israel is a precondition for concessions, the recognition of Israel as a "Jewish state" is without significance – since our essence depends on us, not on others.

The existence of extremist groups such as Hamas and Hezbollah and of a nuclearizing Iran makes a stable peace in the Middle East difficult to obtain. They must be contained and changes in their positions need to be brought about, peacefully if possible, but also through pressure and coercion. Therefore, offering Hamas recognition if it recognizes Israel and joins the peace process, and punishing it if it does not do so is recommended, including maintaining a demonstrated option to destroy it in the event it disturbs the peace process and engages in aggression.

Whatever the best policy may be, Israel is failing to engage in deep historical thinking. The political culture of wheeling and dealing is incapable of it, a blocked regime does not allow for it, the scarcity of multi-dimensional staff work prevents it, and only few of our senior politicians are qualified to do it.

If these failings are not addressed, we are destined to continue on a chain of responses to specific events rather than shaping events, leading to a very problematic future.

Yehezkel Dror is emeritus professor of political science at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. He has served as a senior adviser to several Israeli prime ministers.

Opinions

Why is 25 the new 15?

Our current crop of baby boomers has sworn never to grow old, and middle-aged people seem 10 years younger than they actually are. Indeed, 50 is the new 40.

Subtracting by 10 works well with older ages, but what about twentysomethings? Today, younger people are maturing at a slower pace as well. As David Brooks noted in the New York Times: "People... tend to define adulthood by certain accomplishments – moving away from home, becoming financially independent, getting married and starting a family. In 1960, roughly 70 per cent of 30-year-olds had achieved these things. By 2000, fewer than 40 per cent of 30-year-olds had done the same."

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

Twentysomethings are now experiencing a second adolescence.

Why is 25 the new 15?

The relative immaturity of contemporary twentysomethings is rooted in peace and prosperity. Young people in North America don't have to serve in the military, and many can expect to have their parents provide them with cars, clothing and cellphones. This dependence continues well after high school, with parents indulging their kids by paying their rent and covering their credit card bills.

Or, to put it in plain English: we're spoiling our kids. That's why 25 is the new 15.

Unfortunately, handing our children the good life on a silver platter can do more harm than good. There is a kabbalistic idea called "the bread of shame." If someone is handed a loaf of bread without earning it, they lose their dignity, and even if the recipient may be happy to live life on easy street, the fact that his achievements are unearned is an embarrassment to someone created in the image of God.

To truly be a "man," one must be dignified and independent. Trust funds may pay your credit card bills, but they can also destroy your character.

This issue is of great importance to the Jewish community. In one generation, the Jewish world has gone from deprivation to breathtaking wealth. It's normal for a community of immigrants to want to give every advantage to the next generation, and so we spoil our kids. But hard work becomes unimportant when we hand undeserving young men the keys to successful businesses. Spiritual values get lost when materialism becomes the operating principle, which is why too many Jews make bar and bat mitzvahs that are so over the top. Our community has survived, and even thrived, in the most difficult of times due to faith, community and character. Ironically, our community's material success threatens to destroy the very values it was built on.

Adolescent 25-year-olds are not an automatic outcome of material success. It happens when we forget transmit our values to the next generation. If our priority is to provide our children with values, not valuables, we will have children to be proud of.

Israel's Dr. Hug returns – with Montrealers help

In October 2000, Hezbollah terrorists using United Nations vehicles kidnapped Benny Avraham and two fellow soldiers. For more than three years, Benny's parents, Haim and Edna Avraham, along with the parents of Adi Avitan and Omar Sawaid, led a worldwide campaign to free their sons, unaware that Hezbollah had already murdered them. In Israel, Haim Avraham became a national icon representing all fathers who have been forced to send their sons to war, never to see them return.

Gil Troy in Montreal

When Israel finally confronted Benny's killers in 2006, Haim, Edna, and their two daughters, Efrat and Dafna, spent the war visiting soldiers. While distributing goodies to thousands, they spread the message that the war was just and necessary. Haim insisted on embracing every soldier, lechazek eem chebuuk, to strengthen with a hug.

This January, Haim and his family took to the road again, this time with assists from Montrealers, particularly congregants of Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz of Congregation Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem and Rabbi Adam Scheier of the Shaar Hashomayim Congregation. As soon as they heard that soldiers needed warm socks, long johns and fleecies, they joined others in Israel and the Diaspora and sprang into action. Thanks to their generosity, Haim, his daughter, Dafna, Haim's colleague, Yoram, and I visited the Gaza front to spread his message with love, idealism and treats.

In one gruelling, inspiring day, we visited an air force base, a tent city of reserve paratroopers, a tank squadron, the engineering corps, crack Givati troops, and a naval base. Particularly moving were the visits with the engineers – it was Benny's battalion – and the reserves – Haim's son-in-law served there. One officer who bristled when he first spied interlopers melted when he recognized Haim, hugging him and saying, "I teach reserve soldiers about that incident all the time, to foster awareness."

Haim told the soldiers that his family had sacrificed repeatedly to build Israel. One relative died in Acre Prison in the 1940s. One sank in the Dakar submarine in the 1960s. Haim's brother, Benny, died during the Yom Kippur War, before his brother's namesake, Benny, fell in 2000. Still, Haim remains patriotic, understanding that such anguished heroism protected millions. Haim honoured me with the opportunity to speak. I told the troops they were the modern Maccabees. I said the Jewish people – and good people worldwide – understand that they represented the forces of freedom in a larger struggle against terror.

The soldiers calm, mature, professional and high-spirited demeanours impressed us. This was not a war of anger and chaos, but of necessity and discipline. No one rejoiced in the civilian casualties – and many spoke of trying hard to minimize civilians' suffering. The soldiers noticed, of course, that Israel always targeted terrorists, and occasionally missed. Hamas always targeted civilians. All wars are ugly, but if there is such a thing as a healing war, a war of correcting past mistakes, this was such a war. All wars are brutal, but if there is such a thing as a moral war, Israel tried to fight within ethical limits.

Soldiers joked about the new phenomenon of a "misgrad" – a misgad, a mosque, harbouring Grad missiles, but they detested this kind of blurry urban combat. Still, the soldiers understood that "ein breira," we have no choice. They all hoped that this time, they could finish the job. And they desperately wanted to free Gilad Schalit, the kidnapped soldier whose family has endured the kind of hellish purgatory the Avrahams know all too well, for nearly three years.

At the naval base, a young officer thanked Haim for coming. She said her brother's death in combat when he was 18 broke her parents. She admired Haim's ability to function, let alone to move forward, remain positive and retain his idealism. Every time her mother hears of another casualty, she bleakly welcomes the grieving parents into her enveloping black hole. The Avrahams – like the whole family of Israel – have experienced that black hole's horrors. But the Avrahams show us that life continues – and we should appreciate the heroism and devastating sacrifices of the few that keep so many of us safe and free.

One soldier, absorbing all the love, support and generosity that was raining down on him and his comrades, from the homefront and from abroad, exclaimed: "Tiroo ezeh am yesh lanu" – look at how special the Jewish people are.

How very true.

Why unions don't like Israel

With a strike at York University stopping the school term in its tracks for weeks, I found myself walking empty corridors with an unsought sense of nostalgia.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

York on strike reminded me of campuses in a certain country bordered by the Mediterranean and Dead seas, a country where people eat chick pea-based edibles, work in high-tech industries and maul the language of the Bible. When I e-mailed my brother in Be'er Sheva that I was temporarily off-schedule because of a university strike, his response was quick and terse: "You're kidding! Sounds like Israel!"

Other Israelis responded similarly, recognizing something known and familiar in the faraway and snowy Ontario campus. Israeli universities frequently contend with shutdowns because of striking students, professors or adjunct instructors and must extend the academic year well into the summer months.

So you would have thought that the striking union might feel some "solidarity" with Israel, or with their university cohorts. As public opinion began to mount against the union and in sympathy with the more than 50,000 students left without instruction and without recourse, you might have thought the union would feel some kinship with the one country in the Middle East where truly free unions flourish.

But no, the leadership of the striking union, in the midst of negotiations and rallying its members, found time to post a condemnation of Israel for its assault on fellow unions and a university in Gaza, and to call for a right of return for Palestinians "all over the world" and a "boycott" of Israel, while noting that the views of the leadership "do not necessarily reflect those of the membership" that it was trying to rally together in solidarity. Leaving aside the regional politics, it struck me as odd, and perhaps even counter-productive, for the union to feature a potentially divisive issue when it most needed to present a united front.

At the same time, the head of the Ontario division of the Canadian Union of Public Employees introduced a proposal to ban Israeli professors from teaching at Canadian universities unless they publicly denounced their government. Under pressure due to widespread condemnation for this assault on the principle of academic freedom that is the lifeblood of a university, the union head retreated to focus not on individual professors but on Israeli institutions, echoing CUPE national in calling for a boycott of Israeli academic institutions. The national president condemned what he termed Israel's "disproportionate response" to rocket fire from Gaza. CUPE in British Columbia went further, stating that "illegal Israeli occupation of the Palestinian territories" was "the primary cause" of both Israeli and Palestinian casualties, and it called for a one-sided ceasefire on Israel's part.

Given Israel's union-friendly atmosphere, and given, too, that Israel offers the broadest rights for women, gays, and political dissidents in the region – causes the unions espouse – one might wonder, why don't these unions embrace Israel?

One answer lies in the admittedly Marxist ideology of the unions' leadership. Some years ago, I asked a Marxist colleague why the far left argues so vehemently against Israel rather than taking up its cause. She responded that early on, Marxists had great hopes that Israel would fulfil the vision of a true socialist culture, characterized by the collectivist ethos of the kibbutz movement. But, she said, not only had the kibbutz movement moved from its early collectivist roots, the state itself did not turn into a socialist entity. Its transmutation from a model inspired by the Russian Revolution to the consumerist, bourgeois model of the West was seen by Marxists as a betrayal.

I wonder, too, whether it's Israel's very evolution as a democracy that rankles the revolutionaries on our continent. There is a long history of "revolutionary" intellectuals justifying massive destruction and the ensuing chaos as necessary vehicles for desired change. In the early 1950s, the French writer Albert Camus incurred the wrath of some French Communists and Marxists when he took issue with their glorification of violence committed in the name of "rebellion" against oppression. Camus understood that some of his "revolutionary" cohorts had betrayed the very ideas of social justice that initially motivated them, justifying the very oppression that they set out to oppose.

The Kirshner File

War in Gaza may have restored Israel's deterrence capabilities

Israel pulled out of the Gaza Strip last week, completing its withdrawal about a day after Barack Obama was inaugurated as the new president of the United States. The Israeli army withdrew after Israel and Hamas bypassed Egyptian mediation efforts and separately declared a unilateral truce.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Claiming that Israel's air, land and sea campaign, Operation Cast Lead, had been a success, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said, "We have reached all the goals of the war and beyond." Defence Minister Ehud Barak was far more emphatic, saying that Israel had created "a new security reality" and won "in a big way."

In fact, there is serious doubt that Israel, having been forced to withdraw too soon by international pressure, has achieved all its objectives. Only a week earlier, Olmert said that the war – the latest round in Israel's bloody struggle with Hamas – would be waged until it suppressed Hamas rocket fire and destroyed Hamas' web of smuggling tunnels .

Yet when Israel announced its ceasefire, the rockets were still flying, just as they had been during the entire three-week war. On the last day of fighting, Hamas launched 19 rockets, some of which slammed into the port city of Ashdod and wounded a woman. And shortly before Israel withdrew, the Palestinians fired eight mortar shells, six of which landed harmlessly in the western Negev. In response, the Israeli Air Force bombed Gaza in a brief raid.

Still more disquieting, from Israel's point of view, is that many of the tunnels used to funnel weapons, munitions, food and medical supplies into Gaza from Egypt remained untouched and operational, prompting Hamas to vow that it would replenish its armoury.

Yet, as Olmert and Barak both said, Hamas has indeed been dealt "a major blow." Israel killed several hundred of its fighters and leaders (including Said Siam, the interior minister, and Salah Abu Shreh, the head of its security apparatus), degraded its military infrastructure and pulverized some of its symbols of power – parliament, police stations and government buildings.

But Israel, having stopped short of activating the third phase of its offensive, did not try to penetrate Hamas strongholds deep inside Gaza's cities and refugee camps, thereby leaving Hamas' assets and the bulk of its fighting force more or less intact. Israel's chief of staff, Gen. Gabi Ashkenazi, alluded to Israel's unfinished business when he admitted that "there is still work ahead."

And, of course, Gilad Schalit, the Israeli soldier captured by Hamas in the summer of 2006, still remains imprisoned in Gaza.

By avoiding the most heavily populated areas of Gaza, the Israeli army kept its casualties to a bare minimum – 10 dead, some in "friendly fire" incidents. (Three Israeli civilians were killed and more than 300 were wounded. On the Palestinian side, approximately 1,300 were killed and some 5,000 were wounded).

Nonetheless, Hamas emerged from the bitter conflict in a defiant mood and, more importantly, still in control of Gaza. Its prime minister, Ismail Haniyeh, who spent the war in hiding, claimed that the Palestinians had forged a historical and strategic victory over Israel.

Not quite.

On the eve of the war, Hamas spokesmen, resorting to their usual fire-and-brimstone rhetoric, threatened to decimate an Israeli invasion force, warning that the body parts of its soldiers would be gleefully picked up by the children of Gaza, and that Israel would be met by nasty "surprises." No such things happened. Hamas fighters, taking a leaf out of Hezbollah's playbook, rarely confronted the Israeli army in direct clashes and usually melted into the civilian population, cynically using civilians as human shields.

Shortly before the war broke out, Khaled Meshal, the Syrian-based leader of Hamas and the object of an Israeli assassination attempt in 1997, urged Palestinians in the West Bank to stage suicide attacks against Israelis and mount a third intifadah. The Israeli army and security forces loyal to the Palestinian Authority – which is particularly hostile to Hamas after losing its base in Gaza nearly two years ago in an armed insurrection – foiled such attempts.

And although Hamas' chief allies, Iran and Syria, vehemently denounced Israel, they did not materially assist Hamas, bitterly disappointing its leadership.

Despite Hamas' bluster, Israel appears to have achieved two important goals in this otherwise inconclusive war.

Israel seems to have restored its deterrence capabilities – which were eroded by its less than stellar performance in the 2006 war in Lebanon – on both a local and regional level. In its 34-day confrontation with Hezbollah, Israel did not always display sufficient decisiveness: The air force acquitted itself brilliantly, but the army fell short of the mark. In the Gaza war, however, Israel exhibited no such weaknesses. Israel hit Hamas – an admittedly weaker foe than Hezbollah – hard and and relentlessly.

Israel was accused of deploying disproportionate force, but this accusation was besides the point, since the primary function of an army at war is to win, period. In this connection, Israel's campaign was aimed not just at Hamas, but at Iran and Hezbollah, the spearheads of Islamic radicalism in the Middle East.

By any fair measure, Hamas provoked Israel, sowing the whirlwind. Starting in 2001, the second year of the second Palestinian uprising, Hamas fired more than 10,000 rockets and mortars at Israel, committing war crimes under the norms of international law.

The Israeli army reacted by carrying out retaliatory raids, but not with all its might. Israel promised to harden its reprisal policy after unilaterally withdrawing from Gaza in 2005, but never did so, fearing excessive Palestinian civilian casualties. Sharply modifying its policy after Hamas arrogantly rejected Egyptian overtures to renew the six-month ceasefire and brazenly fired scores of rockets and mortars at Israeli communities near the border, Israel, understandably, responded with rage and fury. Israel set a new tone on the first day of this just war of self-defence, bombing military targets in surgical strikes that claimed the lives of more than 200 Hamas fighters, the deadliest toll in decades.

Tragically, innocent Palestinians were killed as well during the course of the war, but Hamas is to blame for their unnecessary deaths. Hamas could have concentrated on building Gaza into a flourishing statelet after Israel's pullout nearly four years ago. Instead, egged on by Iran and Syria, Hamas squandered its resources by choosing to confront Israel in its quest to eradicate the Jewish state.

Israel left Gaza in a shambles, with observers comparing it to an earthquake zone. Five thousand buildings were reportedly destroyed and 20,000 were damaged. Given the scale of the destruction, Hamas may think twice before resuming rocket and mortar barrages. If this proves to be the case, Israel's deterrent policy will be validated. Hezbollah, an Iranian proxy, seems to have been deterred by Israel's bombing of its neighbourhoods in Beirut: Since 2006, the Lebanese border has been quiet. During the Gaza war, Hezbollah held its fire, though it allowed rejectionist Palestinian organizations to lob a few symbolic missiles into Israel.

As far as Hamas' tunnel network is concerned, Israel may well have scored a victory here, too. The United States and the European Union have promised to help Israel stop the smuggling of weapons into Gaza so that Hamas cannot rearm, while Egypt has pledged to act more resolutely in interdicting such transfers.

Beyond that, Israel has warned Hamas that it will pay dearly for aggressive behaviour in the future. As Olmert put it, Israel is ready and able to "respond with force."

Taking these factors into consideration, Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni has suggested that Israel has established "a new equation" in the region. Yet ultimately, real, lasting peace can only be achieved through diplomacy, not by force of arms.

Students use technology to learn about ancient scrolls

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

About 150 Grade 7 and 8 students at Bialik Hebrew Day School had an opportunity to learn about the Dead Sea Scrolls face to face from two experts at Jerusalem's Israel Museum, and to have their questions answered in real time, notwithstanding a time difference of seven hours and a distance of more than 9,000 kilometres.

The hour-long video conference, a pilot project that took place Jan. 19, was preceded by a similar one for the school's teachers last year.

Amir Gissin, Israel's consul general in Toronto, told the students the project is a unique combination of old and new, using up-to-the-minute technology "to enable you to almost physically be in the museum… and help us understand our ancient history."

"It is a great honour for us to be with you across the ocean, so far away," David Ibgui, chief curator of the museum's youth wing, told the students, as they waved to him from the school gym. "We hope very much that this will be a pilot for more projects of this kind."

Ibgui was joined by Adolfo Roitman, curator of the Shrine of the Book, the distinctive white-domed structure that houses the Dead Sea Scrolls on the grounds of the museum.

The two men appeared on a large screen, while the students could see themselves, at least for part of the hour, in a smaller inset at the bottom right corner.

The students have been learning about the scrolls, 16 of which (eight at a time) will be exhibited at Toronto's Royal Ontario Museum later this year.

Roitman told them that about 220 of the more than 1,000 scrolls that were discovered in the caves of Qumran, on the northwest shore of the Dead Sea, some 61 years ago, are biblical manuscripts. They include the Book of Isaiah, which is now online.

"Is it not really a magical experience that through the Internet, you and me, we are able to read a text written in Hebrew – the same text we have at home?" asked Roitman, who read familiar quotes from the original parchment with the students.

Although it was hard to decipher the text on the screen, Simona Dayan, Bialik's principal of Jewish studies, noted that "we can read here, from Toronto, the same psukim [verses]" in Hebrew.

Among them was the quote, "Lo yisa goy el goy cherev; lo yilmedu od milchamah [Nation shall not lift up sword against nation; neither shall they learn war any more]."

When Ibgui, in Jerusalem, asked the students why they think it is so important to preserve the original parchments when people are still reading the same words in modern books, four hands shot up in Toronto.

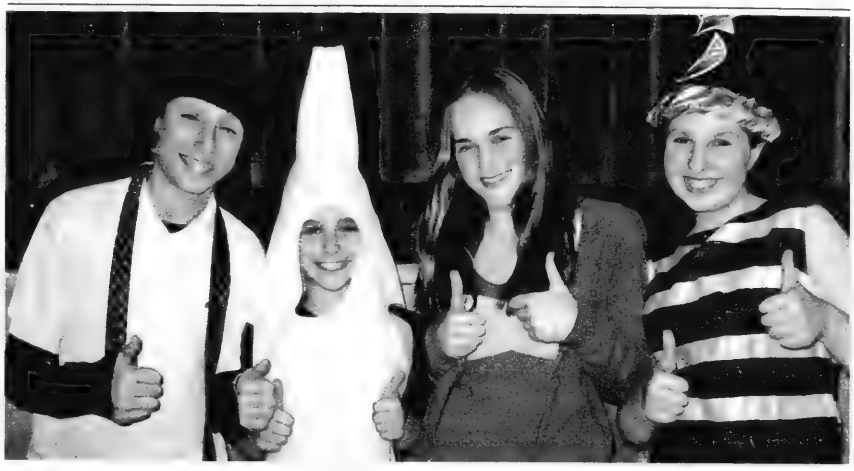
"It's proof that the Jewish religion was real 2,000 years ago," said one girl.

"This is the physical connection of the Jewish people to its land," said Igbui. "The archeologists… actually show that we did not come here [to Israel] to a new place."

Roitman noted that technology for transmitting messages has changed throughout history. Scribes who wrote books instead of scrolls were using a new "technology" in the eighth century, he said, adding that book technology advanced further with the invention of the printing press, and most recently, the development of electronic books.

As a follow-up, students will prepare their own scrolls and send them to the museum to be buried in jars similar to those in which the Dead Sea Scrolls were found.

"Imagine, 2,000 years from now," said Shana Harris, Bialik's head of school, "students might be looking at some of those scrolls and understanding the important connection of Jewish continuity."



CRUNCHY WINNERS: Members of the four intra-school "houses" in Bialik Hebrew Day School's senior division recently took part in a contest to see how many abdominal crunches they could do in a minute. The winners were, from left, Josh Weisleder of Hebrew University House, who came in second; Dylan Lastman of Bar Ilan-Tel Aviv House, who came in first; Nicole Filler of Ben Gurion-Weizmann House, who came in third, and Lauren Schwartz of Hebrew University House, who placed fourth.

Heschel's Helfand not a stereotypical teacher

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Sometimes people are surprised to learn what Avee Helfand does for a living. With his ponytail, trim beard and low-key approach, he doesn't fit everyone's image of a teacher.

New acquaintances have told him, "You can't be a teacher!" They figure he is "a tree hugger" or even a rocker, he said.

"I try to break those kinds of stereotypes," Helfand, 29, said in a recent interview at the Toronto Heschel School, where he is a Grade 6 homeroom teacher whose subjects include science, math, Mishnah and tefillah.

The focus in his classroom, which has a cluster of spider plants and an aquarium with guppies at the front, is on "creative, hands-on activities with an environmental ethos." He also teaches some science classes to younger students.

A lesson from the teacher: "I'll always give someone the benefit of the doubt... We all tend to judge right away."

The tree hugger designation is not exactly inaccurate. Environmentalism plays a significant role in Helfand's educational philosophy and that of the school.

A founder of Heschel's "Eco Team," the future teacher developed a love of nature on hiking and camping trips with his father to Algonquin Park. He tries to minimize his environmental footprint, being vigilant about recycling, and commuting by bike, public transit or carpool.

However, when it comes to rock, Helfand said, he knows only three guitar chords, and the music he plays in the classroom as background is usually jazz, classical, or instrumental versions of Hebrew songs.

A graduate of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto – and before that, Associated Hebrew Schools, where his sister Maytal now teaches – Helfand worked with autistic children while he was a B.Ed. student at Queen's University, and for a year after his 2004 graduation. He also has a BA from McGill University, where he majored in sociology and minored in economics.

Helfand, who ran the children's service at Chabad Lubavitch of Markham when he was about the same age as his students, said he has always wanted to work with kids.

The son of Israeli-born parents, Helfand had thought about moving to Israel to teach English, but a chance encounter with a Heschel office staffer changed his plans. "She convinced me the school was for me."

Helfand was drawn to Heschel's integrated curriculum and strong focus on social justice, which spoke to his own interest in helping others.

During Israel's Second Lebanon War in summer 2006, Helfand volunteered in Israeli schools, and in 2003 he served as a volunteer teacher in Guatemala City. Last year he cut off his ponytail, which has since regrown, to donate his hair.

In the classroom, Helfand tries to connect with his students through "small conversations" and learning about their interests. "It allows me to push them as a teacher – to say, 'I know what you're capable of,' not in a 'calling you out' kind of way , but more like, 'I care for you and I want you to succeed."

Helfand, who has been teaching at Heschel for five years, said he wants his students "to [become] individuals who will go out in the world and do something positive."

He believes in giving positive reinforcement and being a good role model, and expects everyone in his class "to be treated equally, to care for each other. We're a community."

Avee Helfand displays a "mini ecosystem" that was a class project four years ago. [Frances Kraft photo]

Kolel course addresses sitcom Judaism

Rosalin Krieger has always been fascinated by Jewish popular culture. "It's such a part of my Jewish cultural experience. I think about it 24/7."

A PhD candidate in sociology and equity studies at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education of the University of Toronto, Krieger – who has published academic papers and been a conference presenter on Jewishness in television shows – will teach a new course on contemporary constructions of Jewishness in popular sitcoms.

The six-week course, called "Post-Modern Jewishness from 'Seinfeld' to 'Curb Your Enthusiasm,' " will run on Thursday evenings at Kolel: The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning, beginning Feb. 5.

"I've always been interested in questions of Jewish identity," Krieger, 42, told The CJN in a phone interview. Other issues she expects to address in the course include assimilation and continuity.

"These people in Hollywood want consciously or unconsciously to engage us in the discussion of what it means to be who we are," she said. "I think as Jews we should be part of that."

Closer to home, a trio of Canadian series – Billable Hours, Less than Kind, and most recently Being Erica – signal "what could be a new wave of Jewish-inflected comedy on our side of the border," Krieger said.

The issue of "crypto-Jews" on television – such as the ostensibly non-Jewish, but "stereotypically very Jewish" Costanza family on Seinfeld – is particularly interesting to Krieger, who attended Jewish day school until she was 16. She said she would love to have a chat with Garry Shandling and find out why he never "came out" as Jewish in six seasons of his eponymous show.

For historical context on Jewishness in television, Krieger said, "you have to go back to Gertrude Berg," who created, wrote and acted in a show called The Rise of the Goldbergs, and later just The Goldbergs. The show, originally a radio sitcom, ran from 1929 to the mid-1940s and moved to television a few years later. "Her contribution has been so overlooked," said Krieger.

She said she hopes that participants in the course at Kolel will see the shows as "Jewish texts... beyond entertainment.

"This is a really exciting time for Jewish cultural expression." — F.K.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

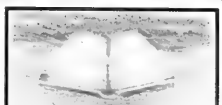
We need to give Obama time

By RABBI JONATHAN CRANE



Excitement and anxiety accompany the beginning of a new political era. Just as many of us here in Canada are excited by the inauguration of Barack Hussein Obama as the 44th president of the United States of America, so, too, are many anxious about what he might or might not do.

Will he enact policies that our community endorses? Will he be silent on issues that we think require his outspoken leadership? What does it mean if he does or does not do something in a timely manner?

For better or for worse, the first 100 days of a presidency are scrutinized by all and sundry. Pundits and bandits alike examine a president's first few months to ascertain and predict the tenor of his tenure. They compare campaign promises with early presidential action to find inconsistencies and signs of weakness. And when these are found, they are only too delighted to spark disappointment, ignite resistance or even enflame unrest.

I don't envy Obama his job. His responsibilities are many and his constituents are eager for solid, not stolid, leadership. While he has spoken about his programs to engender for the United States a better economy and stature in the global arena, he has simultaneously acknowledged that such goals will take time and effort. Indeed, there may be setbacks along the way. Just as there are dark times now, he says, there may be dark times ahead even as he leads the country – and perhaps much of the rest of the world – toward a brighter, more secure future.

That darkness precedes and follows the beginning of a new era is not novel. In Parshat Bo, we see Moses continuing his fruitless negotiations with Pharoah, who, time and again, refuses to see the wisdom of acceding to Moses' demands for the liberation of his oppressed people. With Moses' diplomacy failing, God finally instructs him to convey to Pharoah that the next stage will be a lethal one and that no immunity will be granted even to the aristocracy. Both literally and figuratively, it promises to be a dark period.

But before this campaign promise is enacted, the narrative is interrupted by time itself – or rather, by time's beginning. God tells Moses and Aaron, "This month shall be for you the beginning of the months, it shall be the first months of the year for you" (Exodus 12:2). The importance of this beginning of time cannot be overstated. It is a recalibration of Jewish time. No longer are Jews to live according to a calendar or schedule set by a master whom they did not choose. From now on, Jews are to count and celebrate time more attuned to the vicissitudes of the cosmos than to human desires. Moreover, as Nachmanides notes, this recalibration of the calendar is the first commandment God gives to the people Israel.

But why now? Why in the midst of their bitter struggle for liberation, should the people be obliged to start their calendars afresh? Why should the Jewish calendar begin precisely at a time when heavy policies were about to happen in the midst of winter and, more precisely, in the dark of night? Perhaps it is so that Jews will always associate time's beginning with the arduous process of liberation, as Rashbam comments. Jewish liberation came about not from a single miraculous event, but from a difficult and lengthy process. For only after time's beginning did the harsh plan God promised pass over Egypt. And even more time was needed before Israel came into its own and achieved (many) of its goals.

The beginning of Jewish time may have been painful for everyone – albeit differently – yet it was also the beginning of an exciting and awesome new political (and theological) era. Just as God needed time to put into place His policies, all the more so should we anticipate Obama requiring time to enact this. In the meantime, perhaps we can find the strength to withhold judgment and the courage to participate in the processes he envisions.

Rabbi Jonathan Crane is rabbinical adviser for Reform students on campus with Hillel of Greater Toronto.

Listening to Tu b'Shvat

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

As the holiday of Tu b'Shvat nears, it signifies the importance of remembering that the connection between Judaism and the environment began in the ancient world. Rather than considering environmental issues to be a fad that captures the moral sensibilities of the 21st century, environmentalism is, in fact, woven throughout Jewish law as an obligation.

Tu b'Shvat is technically considered to be the New Year of the Trees. The practical application of this "birthday" was to calculate the age of a tree for tithing and other ritual purposes.

One would assume that this minor holiday would go the way of other very technical tithing concerns: leave it to the experts to figure out and just tell us what we can and can't eat. Yet, much to our surprise, Tu b'Shvat endures as a meaningful, symbolic and relevant holiday in the modern world.

The Torah mentions several times that humanity is responsible for safeguarding nature. We are forbidden to destroy things needlessly, and, in fact, even when the need is paramount, as in warfare strategy, we are forbidden to level a field of fruit bearing trees. The text teaches us that we may be at war with each other, but we are never at war with nature.

The question of recycling articles that we no longer use is immediately answered by Judaism as a necessity, since the Talmud states it's a sin to destroy anything that can still provide benefit to the world. The focus is removed from whether or not an object is no longer useful to me and expands the question to whether or not the object is of any use to anyone, anywhere.

We would be hard pressed to state that there is no use for anything we have. We discard things because we have fulfilled our use of the object, and not the other way around. The Jewish approach is to remove ourselves from the centre of our universe and gain a more global picture of our world. This is not our choice. We are commanded to do so.

Tu b'Shvat provides us with a day to remember to reframe the way we look at the world around us. Humanity is part of a much larger created picture from which we have isolated ourselves. The midrash states that the trees speak with humanity all the time seeking to become our companions. In fact, according to the midrash, all of nature speaks to all of nature, and only humanity has forgotten the language.

A famous Jewish rabbi, Abraham Isaac Kook, said it beautifully: "All my days I have been careful never to pluck a blade of grass or a flower needlessly, when it had the ability to grow or blossom. You know the teaching of our Sages that not a single blade of grass grows here on Earth that does not have an angel above it, commanding it to grow. Every sprout and leaf says something meaningful, every stone whispers some hidden message in the silence – every creation sings its song."

All we have to do is listen.

The Babylonians: Part II

By ALEX GROPPER

The Babylonians had a major impact on ancient Israel, especially the neo-Babylonian Empire of Nebuchadnezzar, at the beginning of the sixth century BCE.

The northern kingdom of Israel had been destroyed by the Assyrians more than a century before. The Assyrians had themselves succumbed to the combined might of the Medes and Babylonians in 605 BCE, at the Battle of Carchemish. By 597 BCE, the Babylonians had moved in on the surviving southern kingdom of Judah, destroying the fortress city of Lachish in the process.

Past Forward

Lachish has been excavated by archeologists a number of times. Two of these excavations stand out. One was the British excavation of the late 1930s whose director, James Starckey, was murdered by Arab bandits in 1938. The other excavation was conducted by the renowned Israeli archeologist David Ussishkin, the head of the Institute of Archaeology at Tel Aviv University.

One of the amazing finds of the excavators was the Lachish Ostraca. The ostraca are pieces of pottery inscribed with writing. In addition to being among the oldest examples of Hebrew writing to be discovered, they also bear vivid testimony to the plight of the hapless defenders who were pleading for help from Jerusalem that would never come.

The excavations reveal the depth of the destruction that Lachish sustained, first at the hands of the Assyrians and then more than 100 years later at the hands of the Babylonians under Nebuchadnezzar. But it was Jerusalem that would be the final target of the Babylonians.

For five years, in the late 1970s and early '80s while participating at the City of David Excavations in Jerusalem under Yigal Shiloh, I got to see firsthand the destruction caused by the Babylonian siege and its aftermath. The debris was almost a metre thick in places, and Babylonian arrowheads turned up amid the rubble. Ironically, a toilet still retained its unmistakable odour some 26 centuries later.

We even found some of the reasons why the prophets foretold the destruction of Jerusalem. There amid the destruction debris in the shadow of the Temple, in the households of Jerusalem, we found idols. There was even a tophet (a place where children were sacrificed to pagan gods) found in the nearby Hinnom Valley. Indeed, Jerusalem was a desperate place in those years before its final destruction at the hands of Babylonian troops.

Ironically, Babylon would not prove to be as inhospitable a place for our captive ancestors as they had feared. Archeologists have even found a ration list belonging to the last king of Judah during his captivity in Babylon.

More importantly, it was in the multicultural crucible of Babylon that important elements of nascent Judaism would emerge. It was the greatest, and arguably, the most important city of the world in mid-sixth century BCE. Babylon was the Big Apple of the ancient world.

It was in Babylon that our ancestors created a meeting house, or beit knesset, what the Greeks would call a synagogue. It was a place where our ancestors could pray, meet and educate their young in their faith. In order to properly do this, they wrote down the stories that had been passed down to them orally by their ancestors.

Scholars even believe that certain Mesopotamian (Mesopotamia is the name given by the Greeks to the land between the two rivers of the Tigris and Euphrates) stories such as that of a great flood even crept into our ancestors' writings.

The work of writing down our collective history and religion was completed by the great scribe Ezra, whom some have called the second Moses. It was in Babylon that the groundwork was laid for resisting assimilation during future trials and tribulations. We went into Babylon as Judeans, but came out as Jews.

Tu b'Shvat on the web, Part 1

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

There's a birthday coming up in your home. Actually the party is taking place in your refrigerator. That's because the evening of Sunday, Feb. 8, is the start of Tu b'Shvat, the traditional Jewish New Year for fruit.

The Jewish Highway

Not one of the major holidays on the calendar, Tu b'Shvat has always had a special significance for schoolkids, the pioneers of Israel and, more recently, to members of the environmental movement. And perhaps because of a lack of formal liturgy associated with the day, many people have crafted new observances to commemorate it. You can find that entire range of celebrations of Tu b'Shvat on the web.

The name of the holiday comes from the day on which it occurs on the Hebrew calendar, the 15th of Shvat. The Hebrew letters that spell the number 15 can be pronounced as "Tu." Tu b'Shvat is not mentioned in the Torah, but is one of the first issues addressed in the Mishnah. [tinyurl.com/shevat07]

The day has religious significance because the Torah has certain prohibitions about eating the fruit of young trees. "When you come to the [promised] land and plant any tree bearing edible [fruit], you must avoid its fruit as a forbidden growth. For three years [the fruit] shall be a forbidden growth, and it may not be eaten." (Leviticus 19:23-25) [tinyurl.com/shevat03] The annual cutoff point for measuring the age of a tree is Tu b'Shvat.

Nowadays, the holiday has evolved into a kind of Jewish Arbour Day.

One tradition known to every schoolchild in Israel is the planting of trees on Tu b'Shvat. You can peek in on Noam and his kindergarten class doing just that as they plant trees in the town of Modi'in. [tinyurl.com/shevat05] Even if you can't make it to Israel for this year's holiday, you can still plant a tree – using your keyboard. The Jewish National Fund's Online Tree Planting Center lets you choose which certificate you'd like to choose with a personalized inscription and the number of trees at $18 each. [tinyurl.com/shevat06]

At the same time, you may want to recite the tree planter's prayer, which was composed by Rabbi Ben-Zion Meir Hai Uzziel, the first Sephardi chief rabbi of the State of Israel. "As for these saplings that we plant before You today, deepen their roots and increase their magnificence, that they may blossom and be accepted among the other trees of Israel for blessing and for beauty. Strengthen the hands of all our brethren who labour in the work of the holy soil and who cause the wilderness to bloom…" [tinyurl.com/shevat01]

Actually, trees aren't alone in celebrating their birthday on Tu b'Shvat. Israel's Constituent Assembly, now known as the Knesset, held its first meeting on Tu b'Shvat 5709 (Feb. 14, 1949.) Every year, even members of Knesset mark the day by planting trees. You can find out more at the Knesset's Tu b'Shvat site, where you can plant a virtual tree in the Knesset's virtual forest. [tinyurl.com/shevat09]

The Jewish Theological Seminary has put together a marvellous Tu b'Shvat page geared toward activities kids can do both alone and with their parents. These include creating a Tu b'Shvat leaf mobile, discussing why trees need a birthday and Planting a Kitchen Forest. [tinyurl.com/shevat02] The Torah tots Tu b'Shvat site has pages to colour, word find and other games. [tinyurl.com/shevat04]

The first fruit tree to bloom in Israel is the almond or in Hebrew, the shekadia, with its white blossoms. And that also give us the most famous song for the holiday, Hashkedia Porachat (The Almond Tree Is Blossoming). You can listen to an excerpt and find the lyrics to the delightful tune online. [tinyurl.com/shevat08] If the almond trees aren't in blossom in your neighbourhood – they certainly aren't in mine – you can take vicarious pleasure from these lovely shots from Israel. [tinyurl.com/ shevat10] For more holiday songs, try out the Tu b'Shvat Song Finder. [tinyurl.com/shevat12]

With Tu b'Shvat almost upon us, you could drop a greeting card in the mail to wish a friend a happy holiday. Better'still, do it electronically with an online postcard. Not only can you celebrate the holiday with these colourful cards – you can do it paper-free! [tinyurl.com/shevat11]

Opinions differ on Gaza winners and losers

As the conflict between Israel and Hamas in Gaza ended, media analysis of who won and who lost began. Not surprisingly, there were widely differing views on the outcome for each side.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

In "Winners and losers in the Gaza conflict" (Globe and Mail, Jan. 19), Patrick Martin quoted Israeli analyst Yossi Alpher, who said that Israel won militarily but lost politically.

Martin wrote: "Not only did Israel lose support from some important regional allies – Turkey, Jordan, Qatar – but the worldwide concern for the 'innocent civilians' in Gaza led even the United States and France to vote against Israel's interests in the United Nations Security Council."

The opposite is true for Hamas, Martin added, citing former Palestinian Authority cabinet minister Ghassan Khatib, who said that while Hamas lost militarily, it won politically, gaining support "especially in the West Bank."

Martin argued that this means Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas "may be the biggest loser coming out of this conflict."

Globe and Mail readers got a very different assessment from David Bercuson, director of the University of Calgary's Centre for Military and Strategic Studies, in "Israel changes the facts on the ground, militarily and diplomatically" (Jan. 20).

Bercuson argued that Israel's military victory in Gaza has important political and strategic consequences for Hamas' divided leadership, as well as for Iran, Syria, and Hezbollah in Lebanon.

Bercuson wrote: "Israel taught Hamas in Gaza that it is very easy for its titular leader, Khaled Meshal, and his entourage in Damascus to call for a fight to the last breath against the Zionists. After all, he is protected by Syria. But he has clearly lost touch with the reality of Gaza. Signs of a split are obvious… If both Israel and Hamas [in Gaza] can agree to a long-term, monitored truce, Mr. Meshal will lose all relevancy."

Bercuson also argued that the impact of the anger in the "Arab street" is vastly overstated. He pointed out that Jordan "maintained diplomatic relations" with Israel. And while "Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan was especially shrill in condemning Israel… the $141-million Christmas deal between Israeli firms and the Turkish air force to upgrade Turkey's F-4 Phantoms remains intact."

He added: "Israel also taught Hamas that the streets of Europe may be crowded with pro-Hamas demonstrators for a few days or a few weeks, but that European countries, the United States and even Russia and China have no love for Hamas and view it, rightly, as Iran's proxy. And that is not likely to change."

Bercuson concluded: "Israel changed the facts on the ground diplomatically as it did militarily… Hamas has been humbled and with it, Hezbollah and Iran."

In conversation, Jim Lederman, senior Israel analyst for Oxford Analytica, agreed with Bercuson's assessment and then some, claiming that "the fighting has changed the political ecology of the Middle East. For example, the internal Arab split was formalized and institutionalized for the first time at the Doha meeting that only the rejectionists such as Syria, Hezbollah, and Qatar, among others, attended, along with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

Lederman continued: "[Egyptian President Hosni] Mubarak, who together with the Jordanians and the Saudis are on the other side of the fence, taught the European leaders that they could stand up to the Iranian-sponsored, Al Jazeera-fostered populist nonsense that a cult of death could masquerade as victimization. As well, in a rebuff to Tehran's determined encroachment into the region, Israel showed that there is a military solution to the Iranian tactics used so successfully in the 2006 Lebanon war."

* * *

In "Israel: Boycott, Divest, Sanction" (The Nation, Jan. 26) Naomi Klein raised her feverish anti-Israel rhetoric to another level. She urged singling out Israel for a boycott/divestment/sanctions (BDS) campaign precisely because the tiny Jewish state – as opposed to big countries, such as the United States and Britain and other "western countries" that are doing "the same" things in Iraq and Afghanistan – is an easy target, meaning the campaign "could actually work."

Perversely, Klein thus proudly admits to being a bully.

Israelis move to Winnipeg to escape Qassams

BY RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Israelis from southern Israel have immigrated to Winnipeg within the last year, in part, due to the trauma of living with ongoing rocket attacks launched by Hamas.

"One of the reasons we came here was because of the [deteriorating] security in the south of Israel," Felix Kavoushanski told The CJN. He immigrated from Ashkelon seven months ago.

"My daughter, who is seven, was in a state of panic when sirens went off all of the time in Ashkelon… We had 12 seconds from the time a siren went off to get into a shelter… Sometimes the siren wasn't working and it didn't go on at all."

Kavoushanski, whose parents are still in Ashkelon added, "When we got to Winnipeg, my daughter heard a siren one day from a fire engine. She said, 'What's that, a Qassam?' We said, 'No, there aren't any Qassams here.'"

Kavoushanski's wife, Victoria, who also has family in Ashkelon, said that the couple's friends in Ashkelon had been taking turns staying up all night so they would be alert when the time came to wake up their children to get them to a bomb shelter.

Vladislov Bogomolny, a computer programmer and his wife, Marisa Risman, a teacher, moved here just over half a year ago, with their two young children, also, in part to get out of the difficult security situation in Ashkelon.

"The real threat [of continuous Qassams] began one year ago, and people started to consider leaving Ashkelon to find a safer place," Bogomolny said. "Some moved to Ashdod, others to Tel Aviv… We considered safety reasons and decided to take a major step. If Israel had fought back earlier, maybe I wouldn't have had to leave."

Risman, whose mother is still in Ashkelon, said, "Some days there were sirens eight times a day… Children get very afraid about the Qassams. When the siren goes off, they begin to cry."

Eddie Zoruval, a recent immigrant to the city from Be'er Sheva, was a driver in the Israeli Defence Forces. "If I were in Israel now, I would have been fighting in Gaza," he said.

"I decided to leave Israel after the second war in Lebanon because the Israeli government wasn't doing enough to protect its citizens."

Zoruval said his parents, brother and his brother's family in Be'er Sheva have been frightened by the Grad missiles that have landed nearby.

"My brother's wife is nine months pregnant and looking after her three-year-old. They can't make it in time to the bomb shelter, so they just have stayed at home," he added.

Michael Cantor, a transport engineer, who moved to Winnipeg from Be'er Sheva in March 2008, said his parents in Be'er Sheva have been "a little bit afraid."

"We have talked about them coming here to live, if the security situation doesn't get better in the south of Israel," he said.

Moshe Kanevsky, an Israeli from Be'er Sheva who also moved here recently, said that although his family misses him, "they are glad I am here, and not in the shelters with them." He added that his parents, sister, brother and other family in Be'er Sheva are "afraid" of the missiles and his brother's children have undergone "trauma."

In the second week of Israel's offensive in Gaza, Kavoushanski, Cantor, and Kanevsky also shared their stories with CBC Radio One here, in an effort to explain what Israeli residents in the south of Israel have been undergoing as a result of Hamas attacks.

Cantor was interviewed by Margaux Watt on her show Up To Speed and Kanevsky was interviewed by Terry MacLeod on the program Information Radio.

Baycrest gets top marks for studying the aging brain

Baycrest's Rotman Research Institute (RRI) is one of the top neuroscience programs in the world, as well as a wonderful resource for targeted brain fitness product development efforts, with both governmental and private investors, says an external review panel of highly respected scientists from Canada, the United States and Europe.

The international panel was in Toronto last November to conduct a five-year review of the RRI, which in its 20-year history has built a stellar reputation in the science of the aging brain and the ability to attract some of the world's most eminent brain researchers (including Endel Tulving, Fergus Craik and founding RRI director Donald Stuss).

The panel – led by Dr. Robert Knight, director of the Helen Wills Neuroscience Institute at the University of California, Berkeley – ranked the RRI as a world-class cognitive neuroscience program as comparable to those at UC Berkeley, UCLA, University College London and the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. In the field of memory and aging, RRI scientists "are probably the best in the world," the panel reported in its executive summary.

The RRI's excellent theoretical science and use of on-site imaging technologies have produced promising cognitive rehabilitation strategies for adults who are experiencing diminishing mental powers from normal aging, stroke, diseases such as Alzheimer's, or traumatic brain injury. RRI science is also informing evidence-based lifestyle strategies that have the potential to slow cognitive decline and help adults extend their functional independence longer.

The panel pointed to last spring's Ontario government announcement that it will fund the creation of the Baycrest Centre for Brain Fitness as a first step toward private sector partnerships in the development of innovative technologies that help Canada gain a foothold in the fast-growing and lucrative brain fitness market. The Baycrest Centre for Brain Fitness will develop and commercialize a range of products from a cognitive assessment tool for the doctor's office to brain fitness products for the home and workplace.

"Partnerships, like the ones we have through the Centre for Brain Fitness and with academic facilities and funders, have a significant impact on our ability to move science toward our goal of transforming the way people age," says Dr. William E. Reichman, president and CEO, Baycrest.

"They are integral to strengthening our ability and dedication to scientific inquiry and innovation in clinical care. This will help our society cross the critical threshold of preventing or delaying the onset of age-related disorders of the brain."

Series of fundraisers benefit brain injury group

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

What would you do if you could no longer recognize yourself in the mirror?

How would you cope knowing that yesterday you were someone vibrant, happy and full of potential, but that starting today, your life might consist only of depression, confusion and pain as you tried to recapture your former self?

These and other existential questions are asked almost every day by many of the 50,000 Canadians who incur serious brain trauma each year, 20,000 of whom eventually die of their injuries, according to statistics from the Brain Injury Association of Canada (BIAC).

That's why BIAC and the Brain Injury Society of Toronto are helping to raise awareness of a subject that often flies below the radar for most Canadians when they think about where to make charitable donations, says Howard Brown, BIAC's founding director.

"We need to absolutely increase the profile of this issue," Brown told The CJN last week.

According to BIAC, brain injuries are the "number 1 killer and disabler of people under 40."

The public fundraising for BIAC takes the form of an annual dinner gala called the Hawaiian Oyster Odyssey. The theme was chosen because oysters contain high levels of zinc, which is thought to be a vital mineral in keeping the brain performing at peak capacity.

Brown – whose cousin, Steven Sieber, succumbed to a traumatic brain injury in 2001 at age 46 after being hit by a car in 1977 – also serves as BIAC's fundraising chair and is the inspiration behind the yearly event.

He and his wife, Kim Cohen – who together run the Toronto PR firm Brown & Cohen Communications & Public Affairs Inc. – make effective use of their personal and business contacts to attract big-name donors, politicians and supporters to the events.

Through their efforts, the Odyssey dinner has recently morphed into a national event, with fundraisers taking place each year in cities across the country.

Brown has called the dinners "an act of tikkun olam."

Despite the economic downturn, he said he hopes donors will continue to give to his charity, and he'll encourage them to do so at this year's Hawaiian Oyster Odyssey dinners.

"My hope this year is that Canadians will see brain injury as a cause they want to get behind in the way they do for more traditional causes," he said, adding, "we want to become the next Terry Fox Run."

This year's Toronto fundraiser – now in its fifth year – takes place Feb. 2 at a midtown restaurant. Similar events in Ottawa, Saskatoon, Montreal, Halifax, St. John's, Vancouver, Charlottetown, Edmonton and Winnipeg will follow, ending with a final dinner in Fredericton.

At the dinners, guests are bedecked with leis and 1960s-era surfer music pumps through the speaker system. An oyster-shucking contest is also part of the fun, and Hawaiian punch is served to all.

As well, attendees hear from the evening's VIPs, survivors of brain injuries who courageously recount their sometimes sad, sometimes inspiring stories and appeal for contributions and help from their local communities in a bid to increase awareness of this debilitating condition.

Donors are also encouraged to bid lavishly on items in silent auctions.

Last year's Toronto gala raised more than $100,000 through corporate and private donations.

For more information about this year's campaign, or to donate, visit www.hawaiianoysterodyssey.ca.

Finding love in shopping

By RABBI REUVEN BULKA

Guest Voice

My most recent visit to Israel, coming as it did in the midst of Israel's efforts in Gaza to halt the rain of deadly missiles into its heavily populated cities, was unique. It was the first time in all my more than 100 visits to Israel that the highlight of my stay was a shopping spree in Tel Aviv.

I know it sounds absurd, but it is true. It is true even though the trip, a yearly Rabbinic Cabinet of State of Israel Bonds mission, had many of the expected ingredients, including a security briefing, a lecture on the challenges of media biases and hearing from some residents in the south of Israel.

There was even a meaningful bar mitzvah celebration for a child from Sderot, whose celebration had to be postponed because of the dangerous reality in Sderot.

There was a visit to Be'er Sheva, where we saw the point of impact of a Grad missile into a school. Had the school been open when the missile hit, the entire class would have killed. Thankfully, the Be'er Sheva mayor had ordered the school closed for that day, and it remained closed for a few more weeks. The day after our Be'er Sheva visit, another missile rained on Be'er Sheva, causing injury and damage.

In spite of all these "highlights," the shopping spree in Tel Aviv was the biggest highlight. You are probably scratching your head in wonder. So, let me explain.

A while ago, the municipality of Tel Aviv decided that it must do something for the residents of the south. Its people have long suffered from the constant barrage of missiles. Hundreds of deaths, many more injuries, extended psychological trauma, closing of schools, inability to live a normal life are all the result of this constant terror.

Additionally, the impact on businesses in the south has been devastating, with attendant severe impact on families trying to eke out a livelihood. So, Tel Aviv invited the businesses of the south to bring their wares to a gigantic hall, about the size of a football field, to the port in north Tel Aviv. For two days, this market became the centre of business in Tel Aviv.

All the merchants of Tel Aviv had to know that this would draw away customers and reduce their business. But that did not matter. What mattered was that everyone had to do something to help their brethren in their travail. And they did.

What a remarkable sight it was. Not the fact that so many businesses showed up and exhibited their wares, everything from Judaica, clothing and wine to vegetables, cake, flowers, cosmetics and jewelry. What was remarkable, indeed truly inspirational, was the explosion of people who came to the market. It was almost impossible to walk in the hall, so full was it.

People like me who came from abroad were overwhelmed. We bought as much as we could, whether we needed the items or not, just to be part of this love-fest.

What a defining moment it was – to see a city open its heart in such a massive display of empathy. This was more than a market – this was a display of love and appreciation, a manifestation of understanding and compassion. It was community as it should be. It was Israel at its very best.

There have been other such expressions, including people opening their homes to residents under siege – residents of the north urging the people of the south, who welcomed them a few years ago during the Katyusha siege, to join them for respite, prayer vigils, and the list goes on.

But the Tel Aviv market was the biggest display of love. One could not help but come away full of confidence and hope – that Israel full of love will overcome the dark forces of hate and prevail in its simple desire to live in peace.

Tel Aviv to mark its centennial this year

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

TEL AVIV — The world's biggest Hebrew-speaking city, Tel Aviv, is getting ready to uncork a panoply of projects and festivities to mark its 100th anniversary in 2009.

"We're planning to use centennial events to promote Tel Aviv," said Eytan Schwartz, a member of the Centennial Year Administration. "We hope they will be to Israel what the summer Olympic Games were to China."

In an interview, Schwartz said that Tel Aviv, population 400,000 excluding its suburbs, will be promoted as a liberal, outgoing, tolerant and multicultural city.

Tel Aviv will also be showcased as a Jewish destination, he added. "This is where Zionism and modern Hebrew took root," he noted.

Planned as a garden suburb of Jaffa, with wide streets and boulevards, Tel Aviv was founded by the members of the Ahuzat Bayit Society.

In 1908, when the modern Zionist movement was still in its infancy, the group bought five hectares of undeveloped land along the beachfront northeast of Jaffa, which was primarily inhabited by Muslim and Christian Arabs.

One of the founding fathers, Meir Dizengoff, would be Tel Aviv's first mayor. After his death, a major street was named in his honour.

On April 11, 1909, the purchasers gathered on the sand dunes along the Mediterranean Sea to divide their acquisition into 60 plots.

The following year, they decided that the city of their dreams would be called Tel Aviv, or Spring Hill.

Growing by leaps and bounds, Tel Aviv attained municipal status in the early 1930s.

On the eve of Israel's declaration of independence in 1948, its population was 230,000.

Due to the Arab blockade of Jerusalem, Tel Aviv was Israel's first capital. In 1949, Tel Aviv and Jaffa were amalgamated. Today, more than 90 per cent of its population is Jewish.

Tel Aviv's centennial year will officially start on April 11, Schwartz said.

Schools are preparing special programs to mark the occasion. Field trips and subsidized class visits to museums, theatres and exhibitions will reinforce students' acquaintance with the city.

Residents will be invited to contribute family photographs to exhibitions, and 1,000 billboards celebrating Tel Aviv's passage from village to metropolis will be festooned around the city.

A history museum will be inaugurated at the site of the old city hall. Its first exhibit will focus on artistic representations of Tel Aviv.

A marathon race from Tel Aviv to Jaffa is in the works, as is a bicycle race. Three new walking paths exploring Tel Aviv's Bauhaus architecture heritage are being built.

The port of Jaffa and the Trumpeldor Street cemetery, the city's first, will be renovated.

And in a tribute to Dizengoff, a statue of him riding a horse will be unveiled on Rothschild Boulevard, the city's first important thoroughfare.

Tel Aviv's annual book fair will return to its original home in the heart of the city, at Rabin Square, and the Eretz Israel Museum will present an exhibition of antiques and artifacts excavated by archeologists in Tel Aviv and Jaffa.

The Turkish-era train station near Neve Tzedek – the first Jewish neighbourhood in what is now Tel Aviv – will be fully restored.

Nearby, opposite Jaffa's clock tower, the Turkish government is building a cultural centre, to be known as the Saraya.

Amid this flurry of activity, the Habima National Theatre, a fixture in the city for decades, is being completely renovated and expanded.

Schwartz can hardly contain his excitement.

"The centennial is a wonderful opportunity for people to say, 'Hey, let's spend two or three more days in Tel Aviv."

Tel Aviv arose on the sand dunes facing the Mediterranean Sea. This historic photograph, snapped in 1909, shows founding members of the city.

Laurier professor calls Jewish students 'nefarious'

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Jewish students at Wilfred Laurier University (WLU) say they feel threatened by a professor who has organized four impromptu anti-Israel rallies during which he singled out Jewish Students' Association members as being "nefarious."

Since the start of the semester and 11 days into the Israel-Gaza war, WLU sociology professor Peter Eglin has been holding unbooked rallies in a public area of the Waterloo, Ont., university known as the Concourse to persuade students, faculty and administration to take a stand against Israel.

"He was trying to rally support, and making a request that the administration make a public statement condemning Israel's bombing of [the Islamic University in Gaza]," said Alex Kaldor, president of the JSA at Laurier and the University of Waterloo.

Despite calls from the administration not to proceed with a rally because he hadn't properly booked the space, Eglin, who is on sabbatical this year, pressed ahead.

As of mid-January, Eglin had held four separate rallies in the space.

In an e-mail Eglin sent out to spread the word of his fourth rally, which took place Friday, Jan. 16, he said he would be speaking about "Israel's war crimes in Gaza… The ongoing killing of Palestinians and associated atrocities… The continuing abrogation of intellectual responsibility by the academic community at WLU [and] the nefarious actions of the Jewish Students' Association."

Kaldor said the JSA is a cultural and social organization that had not made any political statements about the war and was upset about Eglin's accusations.

"We showed up on Friday to basically show this professor that we don't take lightly to him calling our students and our organization 'nefarious,'" he said.

"There was somewhat of an open mic forum set up, and a number of students felt the need to stand up and counter what he was saying in support of Israel."

Kaldor said he respects the professor's right to speak freely, but when Eglin began to verbally attack the students who spoke up in defence of Israel, he knew he couldn't stay silent.

Chanie Antfleck, a WLU student and a member of the JSA, was one of the students who engaged in an argument with the professor.

Antfleck said that when she and Daniel Lipworth, another WLU student and JSA member, took to the microphone to defend Israel, Eglin said, "Those who believe that what Israel has been doing for the past 40 years is correct is morally corrupt and shouldn't be in a university."

Antfleck added: "He targeted the Jewish students by saying, 'You Jewish students… Look at you. You're such a disgrace. Look at the way you're carrying on."

She said that when she challenged Eglin for using the word "nefarious" at the rally to describe the JSA, he countered by saying he should have used the words "devious and underhanded," before telling her to "Shut up, for God's sake."

Michael Mostyn, B'nai Brith Canada's public policy director, attended the latest rally on Jan. 16.

"We had a professor here who was attacking a Jewish student group and students directly, and it is just a fundamental power imbalance, and I don't know how the university is allowing something like this to take place," Mostyn said.

"Students get fined when they break rules in schools. Why do professors not get fined when they are blatantly breaking the rules?"

Since the last incident, meetings between the university administration and members of the JSA have taken place.

"We are currently in communication with administration and the president of the university, [and] with the dean of students, and we are trying to present what we feel is an unsafe learning environment and an unsafe environment on campus in the hopes that they will take action against this professor," Kaldor said.

University spokesperson Kevin Crowley, dean of students David McMurray and Eglin didn't respond to requests for interviews, but in a statement, the school said that it "supports the widely held view that academic freedom, including the unfettered dissemination of knowledge and exchange of ideas, is an integral part of the university mandate. We, therefore, support open discussion, respectful debate and civil discourse. We are also committed to providing our students with a safe environment.

"In an effort to honour both commitments, university officials have met with and will continue to meet with representatives of the Jewish Students' Association to discuss their concerns and explore solutions; discussed concerns with Prof. Eglin, and provided security presence at all related events to enhance the safety of everyone present."

Anti-Israel posters removed at U of M

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Posters put up at the University of Manitoba by the school's Muslim Students Association (MSA) that contained images of a swastika next to the Star of David were removed after a complaint by a campus Jewish group.

The posters prompted Samantha Loxton, director of the Jewish Students Association/Hillel, to make a complaint to campus security on Jan. 8.

"The posters had images of a swastika, and then a Star of David, and these two images were recycled in a row," Loxton said.

"This is the first time I have seen anti-Semitic stuff like this at the U of M," she added.

The JSA had set up an information booth on campus concerning Israel's recent military operation in Gaza, and in response, the MSA put up its own booth and the posters.

Loxton said that the MSA took down the posters after they were instructed to do so by U of M security.

John Genakes, director of public affairs at U of M, said the MSA "gave assurances to university officials that the posters would not be put up again."

חדשה בקנדה

נינה שנהב

"אז תבטיחי לי שתחקשרי!" מתחננת אליסון, בעודה אוחזת בידי בהתרגשות, וחצי דמעה מנצנצת לה בעין. אני כמעט דומעת בעצמי. "מבטיחה!" אני מגיבה ברגש (רגע, יש לי בכלל את הטלפון שלה?) למזלי, אליסון מושיבה: "בעצם אני אתקשר. כבר מחר בבוקר אתקשר." היא נושקת לי, ומוסיפה "ניפגש מחר ללאנץ." מאיר ואני ישובים במכונית, ונוסעים הביתה בנועם. "היה ערב מהמם." אני מתמתחת בפינוק. "ראית איזה מקסימים הארי ואליסון? הם פשוט התאהבו בנו. ממש מביך." אני מושיבה בשחצנות מנומנמת. מאיר מהנהן, ואני ממשיכה "וגם דיאנה, החברה של אליסון, היתה מקסימה. איזה יופי שהלכנו למסיבה הזו. אני רק מקווה שאליסון לא תהיה חברה תוצענית מדי. אתה יודע, היא כל כך התלהבה ממני... שרק לא תהיה קנאית אם אצא ללאנצ'ים עם אחרות..."

למחרת בבוקר, אני דוחה פגישה בצהריים, כי אליסון הרי הבטיחה שתתקשר ושנצא לנו. בערב, אני כבר די בטוחה שלא נצא היום ללאנץ', גם למחרת היא לא מתקשרת, וגם לא בעבור שבוע.

"נורא מוזר." מתוודה מאיר. "איך שהיא ודיאנה היבקו אותך בסוף האירוחה, הייתי בטוח שיש לי כבר סיבה לדאוג בקשר לנטיות המיניות שלך." אני מסכימה איתו לחלוטין. "וגם אנחנו כל כך דומות: צוחקות מאותן הבדיחות, משתגעות על אותה המוסיקה, אותה האומנות, אותם השלברטיז."

"זה רעיון טוב, רק שגם דיאנה תיקחקה את מספר הטלפון שלי בסלולארי שלה, ושכחה לתת לי את שלה. אוף!"

אני מנסה לקבוע איתה למחרתיים, לאחרי מחרתיים, לשבוע הבא, לא הולך. אליסון מסמסת שהיא כבר תתקשר אלי.

אני כבר יודעת בלב, שהיא לעולם לא תתקשר אלי.

מאיר מחבק אותי, ומנסה להשביר: "זו לא הפעם הראשונה. נתקלנו כבר באנשים פה שהבטיחו לנו שישארו איתנו לעולם ועד, ולא שמענו מהם יותר לעולם ועד." והוא צוחק. אבל בכל זאת, היה נראה לי שאליסון ואני זה סיפור אהבה. "אולי היא פשוט לא יכולה להכיל יותר מחברה אחת טובה, כמו דיאנה שלה." אני אומרת במרירות, בעודי נזכרת שאליסון הכירה לי את דיאנה, חברתה, באותה המסיבה. "דיאנה היא בחורה גם מאוד חביבה." מציין מאיר. "גם אותה אהבת מאוד. אולי היא פתוחה ליותר חברויות? תתקשרי." מעודד אותי מאיר.

שוב אני הופכת עלומות ומשיגה את מספר הטלפון של דיאנה. שוב לוקח לחברה האבודה השנייה יובלות עד שהיא נזכרת מי אני. "אז חשבתי לי," אני אומרת לה בתום שלב הזיהוי המצמרר, "שאולי נצא ללאנץ', ונכיר קצת יותר האחת את השנייה. כלומר, אם זה בסדר מבחינת אליסון..." דיאנה שותקת לרגע, ואז מתעניינת בקצרה: "מי זו אליסון?"

מתברר שמאיר צדק. זה לא אישי. (אליסון ודיאנה אף הן הכירו באותו ערב במסיבה, התחברו מאוד, ולא שקלו אפילו להמשיך את הקשר). הקנדים באמת רוצים להיות חברים לעולם ועד, הבעיה היא, שהם לא יזכרים את זה בערך שתי שניות אחרי שהם אומרים לך ביי...

Obituary

Sydney Harris 'exemplified Jewish honour'

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Sydney Harris, a retired Ontario Provincial Court judge, a former president of Canadian Jewish Congress and a fierce fighter for Jewish causes, human rights and civil liberties, died on Jan. 17 of kidney failure after a short illness. He was 91.

Harris was born in Toronto, the grandchild of immigrants who came to Toronto in the 1880s. He graduated from the University of Toronto and Osgoode Hall Law School.

During the war, he worked as an administrative lawyer in Ottawa. Together with Harold Rubenstein, he founded the law firm of Harris & Rubenstein.

In 1976, Harris was appointed a judge of the Ontario Provincial Court, Criminal Division. Among his noteworthy decisions were his acquittal of the gay magazine Body Politic and three officers of Pink Triangle Press for possession and distribution of obscene materials in 1978 and his dismissal of charges, in 1983, against Magder Furs for selling goods on Sunday, at a time when Sunday shopping was illegal.

After his retirement in 1982, he served as a small claims court judge, a part-time member of the Ontario Assessment Review Board, a referee for the Law Society of Upper Canada and a lay appointee of Council for the Association of Ontario Land Surveyors.

Until the last few years, he remained active in Canadian Jewish Congress. Bernie Farber, chief executive officer of CJC, said that before becoming national president in 1974, Harris had served as chair of the CJC's community relations committee and chair of the Ontario region from 1968 to 1971.

Farber said that as a member of the CJC's national executive, Harris attended meetings wherever they were held. He always travelled to them by train, as he didn't like flying.

"He called me regularly, offering advice, with great wisdom and prescience," Farber said.

Together with Sid Midanik and Ben Kayfetz, he worked hard against the neo-Nazi threat, at a time when the Canadian Nazi Party was disturbingly active. "They hired a private investigator who infiltrated the Canadian Nazi Party, and his information led to its collapse," Farber said.

Farber praised Harris' dignity, calling him "a gentleman and a man who exemplified Jewish honour. The likes of people such as Sydney Harris come rarely in a lifetime. He will be sorely missed."

Harris was the regional chair of the Canadian Council of Reform Congregations, a founding member and president of Upper Canada Lodge, B'nai Brith, president of Toronto Jewish Vocational Service (now JVS), and Canadian Friends of Boys Town Jerusalem, serving as its president. He was active at Holy Blossom Temple – his family was among its founding members – and later Temple Sinai.

Harris worked as an advocate for amendments to the Criminal Code against hate literature and for the protection of shchitah. He opposed religious education in the public schools and capital punishment. During the 1950s and '60s, he was an active supporter of the campaign for civil rights in the United States.

He was devoted to his family, his son Mark said, calling him "a learned man, a devoted son, an inspiring father, grandfather and teacher, and a pure and loving husband."

Mark said his father's many activities included doing the New York Times crossword puzzles, drinking single malt Scotch, chess, gardening, travelling, spending time at the family cottage and leading family religious ceremonies such as Shabbat and Pesach seders.

Harris is survived by his wife of 59 years, Enid; his son Mark (and Mark's wife, Ricki) and his son David; grandchildren Lindsay and Brett, and his sister, Thelma Rose.

Egypt urges Hamas to take truce deal before Israeli vote

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Officials in Egypt are attempting to persuade Hamas to accept Israel's current offer of a truce in Gaza before a far less accommodating government is in place if Likud chair Benjamin Netanyahu is elected, the pan-Arab daily Asharq Al-Awsat reported Monday.

The newspaper quoted the officials as telling Hamas that surveys in Israel show the opposition leader is likely to come to power in the Feb. 10 general election.

Hamas' Gaza spokesman Ayman Taha, meanwhile, said recently that Israel has offered his Palestinian Islamist group a 10-year ceasefire in the Gaza Strip. Egypt is also demanding a truce of several years' duration. But Taha said the group would agree to a ceasefire of no more than between one year and 18 months.

Another Hamas spokesman, Ismail Radwan, said a long-term ceasefire "kills" the Palestinians' right to resistance.

Also on Monday, the London-based newspaper Al-Hayat reported that Israel has offered Hamas a ceasefire for an unlimited amount of time and the opening of Gaza's borders in return for abducted Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit.

According to the report, Hamas rejected the offer on the grounds that it linked the opening of the border crossings to Schalit's release.

Schalit was kidnapped by Gaza militants in a 2006 cross-border raid. He is believed to be still held in the Gaza Strip.

Hamas and Israeli officials have also indicated that much of the discussion has centred on control of the border crossings in and out of Gaza. Hamas wants the blockade on Gaza lifted. Israel wants assurances that Hamas will stop smuggling weapons into the Gaza Strip.

"Hamas listened to the Israeli proposal presented by [Defence Ministry official] Amos Gilad, and with it a proposal for a ceasefire for a year and a half, but Hamas presented a counter-proposal of one year only," Taha told reporters in Cairo after talks with Egyptian intelligence officials.

The Hamas delegation met Sunday with the heads of Egyptian intelligence, who informed them of Israel's positions. Jerusalem has not yet clarified what stance it had presented.

Meanwhile, Taha reiterated the group's call for a lifting of the blockade imposed on the impoverished and devastated Gaza Strip by Israel and Egypt as a condition for the truce. "[Hamas] called for a complete lifting of the blockade and an opening of all the crossings," Taha said.

Hamas proposed to Egyptian mediators that European and Turkish monitors should be present at the border crossings, but rejected the presence of Israeli monitors, saying Israeli monitoring is "a large part of the problem," Taha said.

Asked if Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas' Fatah forces would be present at the crossings, Taha said: "Hamas is the existing government in Gaza."

Commenting on the talks, Osama Hamdan, Hamas' representative in Lebanon, told Al Jazeera satellite television on Sunday that Hamas is unwilling to alter its positions for Israel's benefit.

"The Israelis must understand that they will not achieve through politics what they failed to do militarily," Hamdan said.

Hamdan also said Sunday that Fatah must end peace negotiations with Israel before any reconciliation talks can take place.

The remarks were bound to complicate Arab efforts to reconcile Hamas, which controls Gaza, and the Fatah-dominated Palestinian Authority (PA) in the West Bank.

Speaking at a rally in Beirut Sunday, Hamdan – a close ally of Hamas political leader Khaled Meshal – said that the group welcomes Palestinian dialogue, but that any reconciliation should be based on a program to liberate territory and regain rights.

He also demanded that the PA end security co-ordination with Israel, and maintained that the Israeli-Palestinian peace process had ended.

"Those who committed mistakes must correct their mistakes through a clear and frank declaration to stop security co-ordination with the [Israeli] occupation, release [Hamas] prisoners and later end negotiations [with Israel] because the peace process is irreversibly over," said Hamdan.

"It's time for us to talk about a reconciliation based on a resistance program to liberate the [occupied] territory and regain rights," he added.

Asharq Al-Awsat also reported Saturday that Hamas had suggested that representatives of the Palestinian Authority should be stationed at the Rafah crossing from Gaza to Egypt, but that they should be residents of Gaza, not the West Bank.

Israel has been allowing some supply convoys into Gaza, though its borders remain largely closed. The Israel Defence Forces says more than 125 trucks a day – on some days, nearly 200 – have entered Gaza since fighting ended on Jan. 17, but aid workers say the numbers are not enough.

Hamas forced civilians to be human shields: report

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Palestinian civilians have accused Hamas of forcing them to stay in homes from which gunmen shot at Israeli soldiers during recent hostilities in Gaza, the Italian newspaper Corriere della Sera reported last week.

More than 1,250 Palestinians were reportedly killed during Israel's offensive against Hamas in the coastal territory. According to estimates by Gaza officials, more than half of the Palestinian dead were civilians.

But the Italian paper quoted a doctor at Gaza City's Shifa Hospital as saying that it's "possible that the death toll in Gaza was 500 or 600 at the most, mostly youths aged 17 to 23 who were enlisted by Hamas – who sent them to their deaths."

Thirteen Israelis were also killed during the three-week operation, which was aimed at halting rocket fire on southern Israel and destroying Hamas infrastructure.

Israel was heavily criticized for the large number of Palestinian civilians killed in the campaign.

The Gaza doctor was further quoted as saying: "Perhaps it is like Jenin in 2002. At the beginning they spoke about 1,500 dead, and at the end it turned out to be only 54 – of whom 45 were militants."

Envoy pick draws early praise

By ERIC FINGERHUT
JTA

WASHINGTON — U.S. President Barack Obama's selection for Middle East envoy drew praise from Israel, as well as dovish groups and at least one centrist Jewish organization.

George Mitchell was introduced as the new special envoy for Middle East peace at a State Department news conference last Thursday afternoon.

Mitchell said he believes deeply that "committed, persevering and patient diplomacy" can bring about peace in the Middle East and "demands our maximum effort, no matter the difficulties, no matter the setbacks."

"It will be the policy of my administration to actively and aggressively seek a lasting peace between Israel and the Palestinians, as well as Israel and its Arab neighbours," Obama said at the news conference.

The president said he would be sending Mitchell to the region as "soon as possible to help the parties ensure that the [Gaza] ceasefire that has been achieved is made durable and sustainable."

Obama reiterated his statement during last year's presidential campaign that Israel was justified in responding to Hamas rocket attacks on southern Israel.

"Let me be clear: America is committed to Israel's security and we will always support Israel's right to defend itself against legitimate threats," he said.

"For years, Hamas has launched thousands of rockets at innocent Israeli citizens. No democracy can tolerate such danger to its people, nor should the international community, and neither should the Palestinian people themselves, whose interests are only set back by acts of terror.

Obama added that "just as the terror of rocket fire aimed at innocent Israelis is intolerable, so too is a future without hope for the Palestinians." He called for the openings of Gaza's border crossings with an "appropriate monitoring regime" as part of a lasting ceasefire.

The president also said that the Arab peace initiative – which calls for peace with Israel if it withdraws to pre-1967 borders – "contains constructive elements that could help advance these efforts" and called on Arab states to "act on the initiative's promise" by supporting the Palestinian Authority government, taking steps toward normalizing relations with Israel and standing up to "extremism that threatens us all."

Israel welcomed Mitchell's appointment. Its U.S. ambassador, Sallai Meridor, congratulated Mitchell in a statement and said Israel holds him "in high regard and looks forward to working with him on taking the next steps towards realizing a future of peace and security for Israel and her neighbours."

Rise in attacks renews fears among French Jews

By DEVORAH LAUTER
JTA

PARIS — The spike of anti-Semitic attacks across Europe during Israel's three-week war in Gaza has struck a raw nerve here, reviving fears among French Jews that the violence of the second intifadah years has returned to their country.

During the intifadah earlier in the decade, a sustained surge in attacks against French Jews and the government's perceived lacklustre response prompted many Jews to fear for their future in France, with some leaving the country.

The government's belated crackdown on the violence and the election in May 2007 of a new president, Nicolas Sarkozy, with warm ties to Israel and the Jewish community allayed the fears of many and helped tamper anti-Semitic attacks.

But the attacks returned this month with the latest conflagration in the Middle East, enraging French Muslims and resulting in near-daily assaults against Jews for the duration of the Gaza war.

"They are more worried about their safety. They are more afraid than before," said Rabbi Mendel Belinow, leader of a Chabad Lubavitch synagogue and outreach centre in the northern Paris suburb of Saint-Denis that was firebombed Jan. 11.

Two of the nine Molotov cocktails thrown at his synagogue ignited, burning part of the centre's cafeteria. No injuries were reported, though the rabbi was in the building at the time and was believed to have been a target.

The synagogue, located in a heavily immigrant suburb known for its high crime and poverty rates, also was attacked in 2005, when "Death to the Jews" was scrawled on its inner walls.

Over the past few weeks, the Jewish community has seen attacks ranging from firebombings to stabbings. The government's inability to protect them from violence, despite the efforts of French authorities, has generated a renewed sense of unease in the French Jewish community, which numbers roughly 600,000 in a country of 60 million. France has five million to six million Muslims.

"It's harder to reassure them now," Belinow said of his approximately 160 congregants.

While the current ceasefire between Israel and Hamas is expected to diminish anti-Jewish violence, pro-Palestinian groups have promised to continue with their anti-Israel protests. Such demonstrations in France, which have drawn tens of thousands, commonly have ended in riots and are a mouthpiece for virulent anti-Zionism, including the burning of Israeli flags. Jews and synagogues have been attacked during and following protests by a fringe of violent youths.

Jewish community leaders warn that fears of further attack will disrupt the daily routines of Jews and intimidate them into hiding their religious identity – and if the volatile situation is not controlled, to flee the country.

Oren Toledano, the director of the Paris-based aliyah department for the Jewish Agency for Israel, said that in the past three weeks, his phone has begun ringing off the hook again, with many French Jews considering aliyah calling to accelerate the process.

As the government fine-tunes its security measures, community dialogue activists say the Gaza war destroyed years of efforts to prevent a repetition of the violent reaction in France to the second intifadah.

Authors & Poets

The CJN is pleased to announce its

Annual Passover Literary Supplement

We invite our readers to submit unpublished, original works of fiction or poetry that explore Jewish themes. Stories should not exceed 2,000 words.

We must receive your submissions no later than Friday, March 12. E-mail submissions are preferred, but works can also be sent by mail or brought to our office.
E-mail: info@ cjnews.com. Mail: 1500 Don Mills Rd., Suite 205, Toronto, Ont., M3B 3K4.
Submissions will not be returned. Only writers whose work is chosen for publication will be contacted.

CJN Purim Art Contest

It's time again for our annual Purim Art Contest.

Who can enter: Children in grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN's 2009 Purim Poster. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However, they should not be too small nor too large. Please paint or draw bright, bold, colourful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. Please send us your name, address, phone number, age and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, Toronto, Ont., M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 3 p.m. on Tuesday, Feb. 17, 2009. We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen as the "winners." The judges will base their decisions on a number of factors such as: the use of colour, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The chances of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, February 20, 2009.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of March 5, 2009. Have fun and good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

SIGN OF THE TIMES

With Israelis heading to the polls Feb. 10, elections signs and ads dot the landscape. Here, a passerby seems almost indifferent to a Labor party billboard depicting the three main contenders for prime minister: Kadima leader Tzipi Livni, Labor chief Ehud Barak, centre, and Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu. The tagline reads, "At the moment of truth, Barak."

Cambridge students stage sit-in over Gaza

JTA

LONDON — Up to 100 students are staging a sit-in at Cambridge University over Israel's actions in the Gaza Strip.

The students have refused to leave the law faculty building since Friday in an action that follows similar "occupations" at more than a dozen British universities.

The Cambridge Gaza Solidarity group on Sunday issued a list of demands to the university's authorities, including issuing a statement condemning Israel's military action in Gaza, divestment from firms supplying arms to Israel, at least 10 scholarships for students from Gaza and shipment of "surplus" computers to universities in Gaza. The students say they will remain in the building until their demands are met.

Over the past week, students at other British universities have staged sit-ins that have lasted nearly a week, such as at the London School of Economics, or ended peacefully after a few hours, as at Oxford University.

None of the universities has issued a statement condemning Israel's military action or committed to divesting from companies trading arms with Israel. Neither has any agreed to cancel lectures by Israelis or to any other form of academic boycott.

Rather than responding to the demand for condemnation statements, university heads have expressed their support for a statement issued last week by Universities U.K., their representative body. The statement calls for "an end to the conflict in and beyond Gaza," and adds, "We are particularly aware that many of the civilian casualties have occurred in educational establishments."

The statement concludes: "Higher education, in particular, is a global activity and we value our academic links with universities all over the world. The international nature of higher education means it is a force for understanding, tolerance and respect between peoples."

The number of protesting students has been small – a few hundred combined at all the universities. At Oxford, for example, approximately 80 students took part in a sit-in in the library building out of more than 12,000 students that attend the school.

Israel Briefs

Waltz with Oscar?

Waltz With Bashir was nominated for an Academy Award for best foreign film in nominations announced Jan. 22. The awards will be presented Feb. 22.

Waltz with Bashir, an animated documentary by and about director Ari Folman as a traumatized veteran trying to recover his memories of the first Lebanon War, earned a Golden Globe for best foreign language film and won best picture from the National Society of Film Critics. It also won an Ophir Award, Israel's equivalent of an Oscar, for best film. An Israeli film has never won best foreign film.

Death count questioned

Israeli officials denied a report in an Italian newspaper that said the number of Gazans killed in the recent Gaza operation wasn't more than 500 to 600. The Israel Defence Forces is sticking to its original estimates that some 1,300 Palestinians died in the three-week operation, and that at least two-thirds were terrorists. At least 500 are said to be members of Hamas' military wing. The report in Corriere della sera said the number of wounded was also far less than the 5,000 Hamas claims. Most Hamas gunmen dressed as civilians, which has contributed to high estimates of civilian casualties.

Permanent truce sought

The United Nations Security Council called Jan. 21 for a permanent truce in Gaza. It also called for guarantees to prevent arms smuggling into Gaza and for the permanent reopening of border crossings. Britain and France drafted the statement. It was approved by all 15 council members. The council called for humanitarian aid to be delivered to civilians without problems.

Water pumping halted

Israel has halted pumping water from the Sea of Galilee, the state's main water source. It stopped Jan. 19 when the water level reached 16 inches from the "black line," beyond which pumping is prohibited. Water is instead being pumped from underground aquifers, which are also dangerously low. Rainfall in Israel this year has been about half its annual average, and January 2009 is on track to be the driest month on record, Ha'aretz reported. Water sources that flow into the Sea of Galilee are also at the lowest levels ever. Israel is in the fifth consecutive year of drought.

Arab parties can run

Israel's Supreme Court ruled that two Arab parties shouldn't be disqualified from national elections. The court overturned the decision of Israel's Central Elections Committee to ban the Balad and United Arab List-Ta'al parties from the Feb. 10 elections. The nine justices on the court's panel decided unanimously in the case of the United Arab List-Ta'al party and by a majority for Balad. The elections panel had disqualified the parties based on petitions claiming they don't recognize Israel as the Jewish homeland and call for armed conflict against Israel. A 500-page appeal was filed Jan. 19.

Natural gas find disputed

Lebanon says a huge pocket of natural gas found off the coast of Haifa may be in its territorial waters. The find was announced Jan. 18 by the U.S.-based Noble Energy Inc., which has been drilling at the site in co-operation with Israeli partners for five years. Beirut imports most of its natural gas from Egypt. The more than three trillion cubic feet of reserves could serve Israel's needs for 15 years and lessen its dependence on outside sources.

Boycotts hurt growers

Israeli fruit growers say boycotts against produce have hurt the industry. Farmers told Ynet that a lot of produce is rotting in warehouses due to boycotts against Israeli produce in countries such as Jordan and Britain, and Scandinavian countries Sweden, Norway and Denmark. Though some boycotts against goods made in the West Bank have been in place previously, the produce boycott appears to be a direct result of Israel's military operation in Gaza.

CLIC database has over 1,000 names

Earlier in the month, Ryan provoked the ire of the Jewish community by comparing Israel to Nazi Germany for its recent actions in Gaza. He later apologized for the remark.

Ross said CLIC volunteers are also working on creating a website, as well as a Facebook site that he hoped would be ready this week.

According to Ross, as of last week, CLIC's private e-mail database had more than 1,000 names, but he expected that number to grow exponentially through word of mouth when the website is functional.

"We're not a charity. We're not asking for money. It's a private initiative… [but] public opinion is now mostly anti-Israel, and the [Palestinians] are winning the war in that," Ross said.

He added that he and Gissin agreed that CLIC "was our chance to have an effect on Canadians' opinions, where they can make a difference in their own backyard."

Ross added that CLIC alerts will not be limited to just "negative" press about Israel, but will also feature positive articles about the country.

"A positive article is equally important as a negative one," Ross said. "Because if a reader sees it… they get a different perspective of Israel."

CLIC
CANADIAN LIGHT ON ISRAEL COVERAGE

He said CLIC will continue for the foreseeable future.

"There are so many wonderful achievements that happen in Israel that affect Canada and the world that when people start being made aware of that, then we're [perceived as] not just another bunch of yahoos in the Middle East," Ross said.

Gissin told The CJN that projects such as CLIC are of paramount importance for Israel, as the country now must fight on a second front.

"The war for Israel's image is no less severe than the ground war," he said. "All of us need to get more involved in this arena, which is becoming more important every day."

Gissin said he continues to believe that most reports from the conflict that ran in Canadian media had been fair in pointing to Hamas as being responsible for much of the suffering in Gaza while still identifying Israel's right of self defence throughout the military campaign.

"But now that the war is over, we see attempts by some papers and writers to ignore the reasons for Israel's military operation… focusing only on the difficult pictures coming from Gaza [while ignoring] Hamas' culpability," he said.

"Hamas has created a hostage situation in Gaza where 1.5 million civilians have to pay the price for its terrorist links and aggression."

Italian students board train to Auschwitz

FLORENCE, Italy — More than 800 Italian high school students left Florence by special train for Auschwitz.

The annual Memory Train trip, which left Sunday, is part of numerous events Tuesday in Italy marking Holocaust Memorial Day.

Accompanied by Holocaust survivors and local officials, the students will visit the former Nazi death camp in Poland and also Jewish sites in Krakow.

"The risks of xenophobia, of hatred, of racism, of anti-Semitism are still dramatically present," Tuscany's governor, Claudio Martini, told the students at the train station.

Other government officials, meanwhile, took part Sunday in a solidarity meeting at the Florence synagogue following the discovery last week of a rudimentary explosive device placed near the synagogue, apparently in protest against the situation in the Gaza Strip.

"We want to embrace the Jewish community at a moment in which their symbols are the object of intimidation and heavy attacks," Martini told the students.

If I were prime minister...

By RITA POLIAKOV
Special to The CJN

Daniel Caplan has never really been involved in politics. He plays clarinet and drums, is a member of his university's fraternity and lost the student council elections in high school.

But that didn't stop the 21-year-old student from applying to the CBC television show, Canada's Next Great Prime Minister.

"I've always been interested in politics, but I've never been involved. I've done a little bit of school politics... when I was in elementary school, I was the [student council] treasurer," said Caplan, a fourth-year student at York's Schulich School of Business.

"Coming from a business background, I never had an opportunity to get involved in something political."

Caplan's opportunity came a few months ago when he heard about the competition run by the CBC.

"It sounded right up my alley," he said.

The concept for the show came from a 1995 essay contest. Since 2006, it's been a nationally televised competition, and an opportunity for young Canadians to prove their political savvy.

Caplan is one of more than 100 Canadians aged 18 to 25 who competed for four spaces on the show. Each competitor submitted an entry video, responded to three questions online and organized a community event.

Ten Canadians have been chosen to participate in a political boot camp, and four will appear on the show on March 18. The final four will participate in a debate-style competition on the program, and the audience will decide the winner.

Caplan, right, and his friend Paul Jarvey, show their Canadian pride at Prague's Canadian embassy.

Jeopardy host and Canadian Alex Trebek will host the show, and four former Canadian prime ministers – Paul Martin, Brian Mulroney, Kim Campbell and Joe Clark – will act as the judges.

The show's winner will receive $50,000 and a paid internship sponsored by Magna International, the Dominion Institute and the Canada-U.S. Fulbright Program. Second-, third- and fourth-place winners will also receive an internship and a cash prize.

Although Caplan didn't make the cut, he shared his ideas about what he would do if he was ever in a position of political power.

"I guess I think I have some creative solutions that I could apply to problems facing Canadians. There's been a lack of leadership in Canada," he said.

Daniel Caplan, right, poses with former Canadian Prime Minister Kim Campbell, centre, and a friend, Chris Mitchelmore at the Canadian embassy in Prague.

In a video, which received almost 500 views on YouTube, Caplan concentrated on the economy, the environment and Canadian culture. As a business student, he believes that Canada is overly dependent on American trade, which, he said, contributed to the country's current economic situation. Instead of bailing out an ailing auto industry, he believes that the government should invest in an industry with the potential to succeed, such as Canada's forestry industry.

Caplan went on to mention the importance of preserving the environment.

"If we truly believe in reducing our carbon footprint, we need to stop talking about it and start acting on it," he said in the video. Caplan agrees with the Liberal party's idea to raise gas taxes. If he is ever elected to office, he would invest this money into improving Canada's transportation system.

While Caplan said his business background would have helped him understand Canada's economic situation, he also believes that the country needs to unite socially.

And the best way to do that, according to Caplan, is through the arts.

"I think art is something that really can bond this country together. What Canada is lacking is a sense of collectiveness. Art is one of those things that can go beyond those boundaries and bring diverse groups together," said Caplan, who is currently in a band.

As part of the requirements for the show, each applicant was asked to organize a community action event.

Last month, Caplan organized a one-night art show and sale called Urban Expressions of Life at the Propeller Centre for the Visual Arts.

The artists involved were from SKETCH, a Toronto-based art studio for homeless youths.

SKETCH offers a space, located on King Street, for homeless young people between 15 and 29, to build on their artistic skills through instructional workshops.

The art they create is exhibited and sold throughout the city. Caplan's event raised about $200, which was donated to SKETCH.

"The SKETCH thing – that was able to show that art [can] tackle homelessness more effectively than government programs are doing right now," Caplan said.

"It applies to drug use and poverty. Art reflects that. If you have less fortunate people [creating art] you get a perspective into their world," he said, adding that SKETCH's ultimate goal is to help youths get off the street.

Apart from his enthusiasm for Canadian art, Caplan also sees his Jewish background as a political strength. He attended Hebrew school as a child, he is involved in Hillel at York and is a member of Alpha Epsilon Pi, a Jewish fraternity.

"I think that a lot of Jewish people... are somewhat skeptical of Canadian leadership. They're afraid that their voices won't be heard," he said.

Caplan believes that having a Jewish prime minister could give Canada's Jewish population more of a voice, but he also understands the importance of balance.

"I think you're always Jewish, but as a prime minister, you have to put the Canadian interests first," he said.

Although Caplan didn't make the top 10, he said he would still like to continue his involvement in politics.

Hollywood's love affair with Revolutionary Road

By NORMAN RAVVIN
Special to The CJN

The position of Richard Yates' novel Revolutionary Road (Vintage) as one of Hollywood's fascinations this season reflects the American moment.

Norman Ravvin

Yates' postwar vision of American suburban life transfers well to Sam Mendes' film version starring Leonardo DiCaprio and Kate Winslet.

The novel's portrait of a young New York couple, newly moved to the outlying suburbs, is packed with crisp period detail. The ice-cream coloured cars, the under-populated green expanses of new residential developments, the particularity of mid-1950s clothing and homes all lend themselves to the kind of recreation that filmmakers and actors love to attempt.

But another aspect of the novel – its corrosive portrait of young people whose work, child-rearing and half-baked philosophies make them miserable – seems apt for a moment when Americans doubt their past leadership, their global influence and their economic future.

RICHARD YATES REVOLUTIONARY ROAD

Frank and April Wheeler, whose frustration and emptiness are at the core of Yates' vision, are anything but romantic as they struggle over deep differences in their views of the future. Frank despises his daily grind in New York City at an early computer industry behemoth that is a lightly satirized portrait of IBM. April imagines their lives as saveable, only if they follow their youthful ideals to a new life in Paris.

In the background, as they struggle toward a disastrous outcome, is April's unwillingness to bear their third child and her temptation to perform an abortion in secret, without telling her husband of her plans.

Aspects of Revolutionary Road will remind readers of other major American novels. The portrait of postwar New York is reminiscent of Saul Bellow's early work, and the satiric view of an office existence in Manhattan's skyscrapers is a genre all its own, beginning with F. Scott Fitzgerald's The Great Gatsby and carrying on through such contemporary takes on this theme as Jay McInerney's Bright Lights, Big City.

Frank Wheeler's pre-suburban existence, in a rough walk-up in Greenwich Village, is a chapter out of Beat America, as it was portrayed by Jack Kerouac and Allen Ginsberg.

Though Revolutionary Road brought Yates critical and popular acclaim, in recent years it remained a cult book, a kind of underground classic, until its revival for the purposes of Hollywood (press materials for the recent film suggest that it was the single-minded efforts of actress Winslet that brought the book to the screen).

Yates' career foundered after Revolutionary Road. His next books received critical acclaim, but their author dissipated himself in alcoholic bouts, teaching creative writing in far-flung American universities in Iowa and Kansas. There is a dark romance in such writerly decline, and Yates' new popularity seems to be based, in part, on the myth of a failed creative genius.

Revolutionary Road is itself cinematic. It is full of wonderful set pieces in cars, in living rooms, in light-dappled kitchens. Frank and April go about their business with drama and manic energy, but the overall effect of Yates' vision is a sense of postwar emptiness and waste.

Leonardo DiCaprio with Kate Winslet in the film version of Revolutionary Road.

Norman Ravvin is chair of Concordia University's Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies. His books include the novel Lola by Night and the story collection Sex, Skyscrapers and Standard Yiddish.

Neshama Carlebach shares her father's musical legacy

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Neshama Carlebach wants to share her late father's musical legacy with the world.

The 33-year-old chanteuse, who was born in New York City and raised in Toronto, performs about 100 concerts per year in a quest to popularize Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach's religious-themed music.

On Feb. 8, she will return to Toronto to regale an audience at Beth Tikvah Synagogue. The concert, "Remembering Shlomo", is in reference to her father who died suddenly in 1994 at the age of 69.

Carlebach performs his songs, which are inspired by prayers and passages from the Torah. "He said he wrote 5,000 songs, but it was probably more," she said by telephone from her home in New York City.

An Orthodox rabbi, composer and singer, Rabbi Carlebach had a dedicated fan base, and now his protege is following in his footsteps.

"One of my dreams was to share his music with the whole world," she said. "It's magical and uplifting, and in this broken world, we need magic, inspiration and tikkun olam.

"My dad's songs brought people together," she added. "He was Orthodox but very open to the world and non-judgmental."

Carlebach, who left Toronto a decade ago to pursue her career, has been in the entertainment business since the age of five. "I took acting and singing lessons. All I wanted was to perform, and he encouraged me."

She began singing with him when she was a teen, and at the age of 19, she accompanied him on an extensive concert tour.

"I learned everything from my father. He taught me how to connect with an audience. He could connect on a very deep level and that made him an incredible rabbi and a moving performer. I don't pretend to have that gift, but I strive for it.

"He also taught me the importance of silence, to appreciate the moments between music."

Neshama Carlebach

Carlebach, who turned professional shortly after her father's untimely death, usually performs at Jewish venues ranging from synagogues to community centres.

Apart from concerts in North America, she has toured a host of countries from Israel, Poland and Ukraine to Holland, Britain and South Africa.

She last visited Toronto in May 2008. She has also appeared in Winnipeg, Vancouver, Edmonton and Saskatoon.

"The travelling doesn't bother me, though it's not easy to pick up and leave," said Carlebach, who toured with her son Rafael, until he was 19 months old.

"I love the opportunity to connect with new audiences. But when Rafael became too active, it was too hard shlepping him along on these trips."

As she spoke, Rafael, now two, could be heard wailing in the background. "Come to mama," she said tenderly.

Carlebach's husband, Steven Katchen, a restaurant manager, used to accompany her on concert trips as well.

Since 1996, she has made six CDs – Soul, Ha Neshama shel Shlomo, Dancing with my Soul, Ani Shelach, Journey, and most, recently, One and One.

She is in the midst of finishing her seventh CD for Sojourn Records, recording her father's songs with an African-American gospel choir from a Baptist church in New York City.

Carlebach, who sings in English and Hebrew, has worked with that choir for the past four years. She was introduced to them by Rabbi Avi Weiss, who is her own rabbi and was close to her father.

Carlebach considered her father her best friend and misses him dearly. "But he never really left me," she mused.

Today, she is the only entertainer in her family. Carlebach's mother, Neila, is a teacher, while her sister, Nedara, is a homemaker who made aliyah.

SCRAPBOOKS HIGHLIGHT MOLLY PICON'S GLOWING CAREER IN THE YIDDISH THEATRE

A highly personal account of Yiddish theatre in the 20th century will be on view during the first exhibition of the scrapbooks of legendary performer Molly Picon and her spouse and collaborator Yonkel (Jacob) Kalich.

The American Jewish Historical Society presents "Pages from a Performing Life: The Scrapbooks of Molly Picon," starting Jan. 26 in the Center for Jewish History, Lower Manhattan.

Born Margaret Pyekoon on the Lower East Side in 1898, Picon started performing in the Yiddish theatres of New York's Second Avenue, later moving to Broadway and Hollywood. With appearances in such shows as Yonkele, Shmendrik and Mamele, she delighted audiences around the globe and became known as "the darling of Second Avenue." She may be best known for her 1971 role as Yente the Matchmaker in Norman Jewison's film version of Fiddler on the Roof.

From 1919 to 1967, Molly and Yonkel kept 22 scrapbooks of clippings, reviews, interviews, fan letters, programs, telegrams and other ephemera. These personal documents serve as the centrepiece for the exhibition, which also includes posters, photographs, scripts and correspondence from the American Jewish Historical Society collection and the YIVO Institute. The Center for Jewish History is at 15 W. 16th St., New York.

Toronto-born comedian steps out of his comfort zone

By RITA POLIAKOV
Special to The CJN

Dylan Mandlsohn's standup career started in a high school auditorium.

"When I was 17 years old, I did a show in high school, and it was the best feeling I've ever had in my life," he said.

Mandlsohn has been doing standup comedy for 11 years. He's performed at the Just for Laughs international comedy festival and the Boston comedy festival, has starred in his own Comedy Now special and continues to tour Canada and America.

Mandlsohn was always a class clown. Comedy, for the 28-year-old, wasn't just about getting laughs, it was about acceptance.

"Being funny was a great way to become accepted in high school. As long as I was the funny guy, I was accepted. No one really asked who I was, what my story was, it was, 'Hey, Dylan, do the impression of Arnold Schwarzenegger,'" he said.

"It was just easier to make people laugh, it keeps them at arm's length... it was just a way to make friends and not show all the sides. If I was sad, I could mask that."

When Mandlsohn was 18, he participated in a Yuk Yuk comedy club's new talent night.

"They liked me, they invited me back, and then it snowballed into working for Yuk Yuk's."

While the comedian attended the University of Windsor for drama, most of his university years were spent on the road, going from comedy club to comedy club.

"I was a straight C student. I was writing essays on hotel scratch pads," he said.

At 22, Mandlsohn decided to take some time off from comedy.

"I felt I was addicted to the laughs. I was addicted to the compliments that came with the show, and I could easily be shattered if someone didn't like my show," he said.

"I thought, 'I'm not going to become the person or comedian I want to become if I'm so dependent on being validated by people."

Now, comedy is Mandlsohn's full-time job, although he occasionally substitute teaches on the side and would like to get into television and movies. He owns two houses, one in Toronto and another in Los Angeles, and continues to tour North America.

In the past 11 years, his comedy style, which is a combination of observations, impersonations and funny faces, has matured.

"My routines have changed... before, there were a lot of impressions, it was character driven. Now, I have a stronger point of view on stage... now there's a point to the mimickery," he said.

"My jokes come from a lot of observations and a lot of things that frustrate me. Frustration is such a great emotion to create off of."

Mandlsohn's routine includes material about his time at teacher's college, his experiences with women and his religion.

"It's a small percentage [of my routine] but definitely a significant one... It affects me. There's aspects of how I've grown up as a Jewish person, things that I've really enjoyed and things that have frustrated me," he said.

While performing in American towns, Mandlsohn, who grew up in Toronto, was forced to step out of his comfort zone.

"I remember doing different audiences, coming into the States and doing a run in Florida. The audiences down there are Republican and religious. I'm everything the opposite. I'm more liberal minded... If I can make those people laugh, [my jokes] must be funny," he said.

Dylan Mandlsohn

When he can't identify with an audience, Mandlesohn tries to get the audience to identify with him.

"I have to get them to understand who I am... when I'm on stage, they can still see where I'm coming from even if they're like, 'I never had that experience before.'" he said.

"I'm a Jew. Some people have never met a Jewish person before, but I still make them laugh."

Mandlsohn is currently involved in the Groundlings Improvisational Troupe in Los Angeles.

"[Improv] is a different animal. Stand-up is one person behind a mike that... expects a laugh every 15 seconds. Improv is a scene. There can be no laughs until the very end," he said.

While Mandlsohn can be described as a seasoned professional, the comedian still gets nervous before his shows.

"It's a different type of nervous, like a roller-coaster ride, when you hear the click. You're already committed, you think, 'Oh my God, I can't believe I'm doing this,'" he said.

But still, he continues to perform.

"I really, really want to be on that ride. My wanting to be on that ride is bigger that the fear I have."

Mandlsohn's next shows in Canada are at Yuk Yuk's in Kitchener, Ont., on Feb.13 and 14.

His myspace page is at www.myspace.com/comediandylan.

AUTHOR KATHY KACER WINS AWARD FOR THE DIARY OF LAURA'S TWIN

Kathy Kacer, a former psychologist turned author, has won the prestigious U.S. National Jewish Book Award in the children's and young adult category for The Diary of Laura's Twin, the latest in a string of popular titles she has produced for the Second Story Press' Holocaust Remembrance Series for Young Readers.

The book tells the story of a modern-day Jewish girl of bat mitzvah age who is "twinned" with a Jewish girl from the Warsaw Ghetto through a mysterious diary given to her by her teacher. The book includes photographs, biographies of young heroes of the Warsaw Ghetto uprising and true accounts of real young people being "twinned" with young Holocaust victims under the auspices of school programs on the Holocaust.

Kacer's previous books include Clara's War, Hiding Edith, and The Secret of Gabi's Dresser, the last of which she has adapted into a stage play. Her literary efforts have already reaped numerous prizes such as the Silver Birch, Red Maple, Hackmatack and Canadian Jewish Book Awards.

Kathy Kacer

The Jewish Book Council is slated to present Kacer with the 2008 National Jewish Book Award at a ceremony in New York City on March 5.

York students' federation passes anti-Israel motion

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Hillel at York president Daniel Ferman said he is shocked that the York Federation of Students (YFS) focused on passing a motion condemning Israel last week, rather than on the 11-week York University strike.

The motion, which was passed unanimously by the YFS on Jan. 21, called the recent war between Israel and Hamas "the single largest massacre in Gaza," and said "Israel's current occupation of Gaza has dramatic negative implications on how Palestinian youth and their families access basic human rights."

The motion said that the YFS condemns "Israeli attacks on civilian, humanitarian targets, universities, United Nation schools and academic infrastructure in Gaza that have lead to the bombing and mass destruction of educational institutions and caused over 1,200 civilian deaths."

In Hillel's statement, Ferman wrote that the YFS didn't include a single motion that condemned Hamas "for targeting Israeli civilians with rocket fire over the past eight years, for using educational facilities, mosques and residential buildings as storehouses for arms, and for using students and other civilians as human shields for its terrorist activities."

Elaborating on the press release, Ferman told The CJN that the fact that YFS refers to all the casualties as "civilians, even though many were Hamas terrorists, clearly shows how much the YFS resolution is based on propaganda, rather than reality."

He added that while Hillel organized "a large contingent of students" to attend the meeting, "their concerns were ignored when it came to voting on the motion."

York student Mario Dell'Osso attended the meeting and later posted a note about the meeting on a Facebook group called York University Anti-Strike Group. "The motion passed unanimously with all members supporting it, despite the calls for amendment of the motion to identify the totality of the issue," Dell'Osso wrote.He also criticized the speaker who lead the meeting, Ashkon Hashemi, saying his behaviour was "inappropriate," and he appeared "irate and confrontational" when dealing with students who opposed the motion.

Safed getting a park thanks to JNF Canada

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

SAFED, Israel — Thanks to Canadian generosity, this ancient city in the Galilee is getting its first municipal park.

Partially funded by the Jewish National Fund of Canada, and the focus of Toronto's 2008 Negev Dinner in honour of Alan and Sandy Posluns, the Blue Valley Park is scheduled to open in the spring.

Although construction started last April, the 10 million shekel project – a joint undertaking of the JNF, the ministry of tourism and Safed's municipality – has been in the works for a decade, said Yacov Danino, a senior JNF official in Safed.

Intended to serve both local residents and foreign visitors, the park is in a steep valley in the Birya Forest, a well-known nature preserve in northern Israel.

It is designed to achieve three overlapping objectives: to develop a "green lung" for Safed, to create a recreational area for a city that, strangely enough, lacks a park, and to strengthen Safed's tourist infrastructure.

"Urban parks are an essential component of transforming and enriching our cities," said Danino, the director of the administration and maintenance department of JNF's northern region office.

Located at the western entrance of the city, the park will contain leisure areas, gardens with fruit trees, pools with ducks, geese and swans, streams, asphalt paths, restored terraces, picnic benches and a parking lot.

An observatory will offer stunning views of Mt. Meron – the highest peak within Israel's pre-1967 borders – and Nahal Amud, a popular hiking area.

The park already contains an old mikvah still in use and fed by a natural spring.

Built amidst an abandoned Armenian cemetery whose weathered headstones will remain untouched, the park will be surrounded by a fence to keep out wild animals.

Containing groves of gnarled, olive trees, it is also filled with a profusion of almond and carob trees, poplar and oak trees, Atlantic pistachio trees and shrubs and bushes.

"It will be a perfect place for a walk in a park," said Danino.

Archeologists unearth sculpture from 2nd-3rd century

By NADAV SHRAGAI
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspapers Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Archeologists have unearthed a marble sculpture during an excavation in Jerusalem's City of David that they say dates back to the second or third century CE.

The marble bust of a bearded man's head was discovered during the excavations that the Israel Antiquities Authority is conducting in the Givati car park in the walls around Jerusalem National Park.

Doron Ben-Ami and Yana Tchekhanovets, directors of the excavation at the site on behalf of the Israel Antiquities Authority, said the figurine's short curly beard and head tilted to the right is indicative of Greek influence and can be dated to the time of the emperor Hadrian or shortly thereafter (second-to-third centuries CE).

According to Ben-Ami and Tchekhanovets, "The high level of finish on the figurine is extraordinary, while meticulously adhering to the tiniest of details."

They added that the pale-yellow shade of the marble may point to the eastern origin of the raw material from which the image was carved, but they are still verifying that matter.

The figure's stylistic motifs, such as its short hairstyle, the prominent lobes and curves of the ears, as well as the almond-shaped eyes, suggest that the object most likely portrays an athlete, probably a boxer.

Boxing was one of the most popular fields of heavy athletics in Roman culture and more than once, Roman authors mention the demand by the Roman public in general, and the elite in particular, for boxing matches.

"To the best of our knowledge, to date no similar artifact made of marble (or any other kind of stone) bearing the same image that was just found has been discovered in excavations elsewhere in the country," Ben-Ami and Tchekhanovets said. "It seems that what we have here is a unique find."

Not long ago, a collection of 264 gold coins was also uncovered at the same site.

Pressel makes golf history by age 20

By MARVIN GLASSMAN
Special to The CJN

BOCA RATON, Fla.— Most golfers at 20 are still learning the game, but American Jewish pro Morgan Pressel made golf history by winning her second pro tournament in 2008.

In only her third year competing on the Ladies Professional Golf Association (LPGA) circuit, Pressel became one of only four players in LPGA history to win two tournaments by age 20, after winning the Kapula Classic in October. Shooting an eight-under-par 280, she won the tournament impressively with three birdies in her last four holes for a one-stroke victory over Suzann Pettersen.

Pressel's achievement is especially noteworthy, considering that recently retired LPGA Hall of Famer Annika Sorenstam and current top-ranked golfer Lorena Ochoa both didn't win their first tournaments until age 23.

"There are never any guarantees in golf, but Morgan has more than a head start to becoming one of the great golfers in LPGA history," said retired LPGA Hall of Famer Amy Alcott, who is also a member of the International Jewish Sport Hall of Fame in Israel.

"I won three tournaments by age 20 and had a great belief in myself, which Morgan also has. She is destined to be a Hall of Fame golfer."

Pressel's first brush with history came in 2001, when she was the youngest golfer ever to qualify for the U.S. Women's Open as a 12-year-old. In 2007, she made history again by became the youngest ever, at 18 years and 10 months, to win a major championship – the Kraft Nabisco Championships in Rancho Mirage, Calif.

"I am elated at what I achieved so far, but I want to strive to do better. I learned very quickly that to do well at golf, I have to work hard on it," Pressel said.

To achieve that end, Pressel hired Adam Schreiber as her coach in early 2008. He helped improve her swing and distance, two of her weaknesses.

Morgan Pressel

Despite winning her second tournament, passing the $2 million (US) mark in career earnings and finishing in the top 10 five times, Pressel also missed the cut five times last season and is ranked under 100 for distance. Putting remains her forte.

"I have to work hard at this. I'm not happy if I don't improve," Pressel said.

"You have to be a perfectionist to win at golf. I hated to lose more than I enjoyed the wins, and that drove me to a great career, and I see Morgan reacting the same way," Alcott said.

Pressel's other asset is having her grandfather, Herb Krickstein, by her side. He's been a mentor to Morgan since she took up the game at age eight.

For Krickstein, it was deja vu to again guide a young athlete. Some 26 years ago, his son, Aaron, made history at age 16 by becoming the youngest person to win a pro tennis title – in Tel Aviv. Krickstein was a world top 10 tennis player from 1983 to 1994, ranking as high as sixth in the world in 1990.

But Pressel's young life has not been all about fun and golf.

Her mother, Kathy, died of breast cancer in 2003 at age 43, and Pressel has dedicated herself to raising funds to fight the disease. Her tournament in Boca Raton has raised $800,000 (US) over the past two years.

Pressel's fame as a rising star and the only Jew on the LPGA tour has made Jewish community leaders seek her out for fundraising events, as was the case when Maccabi Canada in Ottawa gave Pressel a reception when she competed at the CN Canadian Women's Open in August.

"I love to be the catalyst to draw young Jews and others to compete in golf, so I want to set an example by being proud of who I am and all I accomplish and hope to accomplish," she said.

Gaza war spurs interest in Maccabiah Games

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Israel's incursion into Gaza had an unexpected effect on the Maccabi sports movement.

Maccabi Canada has been swamped since late December, when hostilities began, with hundreds of calls from athletes who want to compete in the Maccabiah Games this summer, said Leon Elfassy.

Elfassy heads Maccabi Canada's National Athletic Committee (NAC), responsible for having the final say on who competes.

"It's been unbelievable. It's totally different than in 2001," he said.

That was the year when, as the result of the second intifadah and terrorist attacks in Israel, Canada came within a hair's-breadth of not participating at all.

"We were getting hundreds of phone calls to cancel," Elfassy said. "People were concerned, questioning." The number of athletes who eventually did go was significantly reduced. Violence just days before the Games and fear of violence contributed to keeping participants away.

"Now we're getting calls of support. 'How can we help? What can we do?'" Elfassy said

The difference in the community's attitude, he readily acknowledged, probably lies in the timing. This time, six months still remain until the July 12 start.

"If [the Gaza war] had happened in June, a month before the Games, it might have had a different impact," Elfassy said.

The surge in demand to compete at the Games stands out all the more in light of the fact that several Maccabiah events are slated to take place in areas of southern Israel, within range of rockets and missiles from Gaza, such as Ashdod.

In any case, he said that that while team sports have quotas on the number of athletes competing, increased support for the Games in Canada coming out of the Gaza situation will translate into more individuals competing, especially in the master's category (over age 35) in such sports as swimming, golf and tennis.

As things stand, Canada is due to send a record number of more than 450 Jewish amateur athletes to the 18th, "chai" edition of the Maccabiah Games, as well as 100 or so coaches, managers, trainers and medical staff, for a total of about 550 – another record.

Elfassy said Canada has a good shot at medals in wrestling, softball, junior baseball, rhythmic gymnastics, cycling, soccer and golf. Montreal golfer Daniel Knight is only a teen, but is so good he'll play on the men's "open" golf team instead of with the juniors.

Low-maintenance love

ALMOST FAMOUS

By Jacob Medjuck

St. Valentine has a day named for him that historically been rather dangerous for Jews. That said, it's also an annual celebration of romance. This year, my college roommate has finally decided to achieve success at dating, and his strategy boils down to a sense of humour, abs of steel, and plants.

"A sense of humour– women put this high on their list," he tells me. Fortunately for my old friend, he's got the funny.

But although humour is truly a true social tool, is it really the key to romance? I did comedy for seven years. I was lousy for six of them. In my last year at the microphone, with my sharpest stuff firing. I observed this strange reaction from crowds: laughter. Women would say, "That guy was funny." Which started well enough. And then they'd go home and undress for their boyfriends, which to me was not funny.

My shows became foreplay for other couples.

Women don't want to be with a guy who's funny, they want to be "near" a guy who's funny – and then go home with Brad Pitt.

Which brings us to Brad Pitt's "Fight Club" abs of Adonis. That should do the trick. I've never had this trick to employ myself, although I've heard of its mystical allure.

A meticulous diet, a regimen of exercise and calorie-counting, or a series of ridiculous surgeries will provide the prescribed steel-cut abs that women melt over. I've seen men spend fortunes on fitness, gym memberships and protein powders chasing that elusive, chiselled charm. It has thus become my opinion that men desire Brad Pitt's abs slightly more than women do.

To confound the point entirely, when I look outside, I see thousands of doughy dudes in happy relationships.

Abs, I believe, are a plus, but not a limiting factor.

You could always argue that a man's net worth is the aphrodisiac – but in this economy, who's worth anything anymore? And people are still successfully dating.

Humour: you're either born with it, or you're not. But what does it matter when you can put on Seinfeld and dim the lights?

Abs: you're either born with them, or you buy them, paying in sweat and broccoli, or liposuction. But I've got chubby chums who prove they're not necessary.

And although it's ridiculous, Ockham's razor ultimately solves the question logically: with all other things being equal, the simplest solution is often the correct one.

Plants. The secret to attracting a female is vegetation. Plants in a home set the mood.

Think carefully before you criticize. House plants are supposed to represent nurturing, the ability to let life flourish under one's care.

Says the girl: "Oh, I notice you have a plant. Can I stay over tonight?"

Plants don't rely on your genetics, on your income or your sense of humour. You don't have to grow them, or even buy them – you can dig them up and bring them home (although I suggest buying or growing).

Bald or coifed, tall or stout, it's not the size of a man but the colour of his thumb that counts.

Accepting this, I took my college roommate to the plant store. We asked, "Which plant is least likely to die?"

The wise shopkeeper corrected us: "We prefer to ask, 'Which plants can thrive with the least light and care?'"

And with that, he had us nailed: "Able to provide the least light and care."

In that moment, we realized the seed of our previous romantic failures – that is, from where the trouble stemmed.

It wasn't a sense of humour, abs or money that we lacked. Apparently, we were simply missing the desire to care sufficiently.

Regardless, we left with two cacti and a jade plant.

Desert fauna. A start.

Note to finer gentleman: water your wives.

ELLA'S HUNGARIAN GOULASH SOUP

- 2 lbs beef cut into 1"cubes
- 1 5.5 oz can tomato paste
- 2 med onions, chopped
- 4 1/2 c beef stock
- 3 med. carrots, sliced
- 2 celery stalks, cubed
- 1 bay leaf
- 1 tsp salt
- 3/4 tbsp Hungarian hot paprika
- 2 1/2 tbsp. Hungarian sweet paprika
- 1 cup diced tomatoes (with liquid)
- 2 tbsp vegetable oil
- 2 tblsp flour
- 1/2 tsp caraway seeds
- 3 c boiling water
- 1 parsnip, cubed
- 3 potatoes, cubed
- 1 tbsp sugar
- 1/2 tsp pepper

Mix paprika & flour; coat beef with mixture. Heat oil in non stick pan; sear beef on all sides. Set aside (include brown bits from pan). In large pot on top of stove, add a little oil and saute onion and caraway seedsuntil soft. Add beef, brown bits from pan and broth; cook for 1/2 hour. Add in remaining ingredients. Reduce heat to low; cover and simmer 1 1/2 hours stirring occasionally to avoid sticking. Yield: 10 servings.

Food is key to fitness

FITNESS CORNER

By FELYCE ZOMPARELLI

Food. Why has it become so complicated?

I'm always amazed at how often I talk about food during sessions with my clients. I answer more questions every day about food than I do about exercise.

You see, exercise is easy. Our bodies love to move, and once we show out bodies how to do that, they usually crave it. But what constitutes a healthy meal choice has become more and more confusing.

Our bodies reflect what we eat. Our food choices make up 50 to 70 per cent of what our bodies look like. We are being bombarded every day with quick, easy ways to achieve our weight loss goals, yet most of them don't include exercise or balanced nutritional choices.

Food is big business, but what's become an even bigger business is diets and weight loss. The best way to get healthy, fit and lean forever is to eat right and exercise regularly. Eating right is really simple if you think about it and follow these simple rules: you need a lean protein, a healthy fat and a good carbohydrate in every meal, not only for energy but also for health and wellness.

If you feel tired within an hour after eating a meal or snack, most likely you have made a bad food choice. Read the labels on the foods that you buy. If you don't understand what's in it, don't eat it.

Healthy fats are very important for weight management. Your body won't release toxic fat if you don't give it healthy fat, because healthy fat is necessary for cellular production. Fruits and vegetables are good for you because of their high nutritional value, especially right after a workout, as they replace the glycogen stores that you've just used up.

For example, eating an apple after your workout will increase your body's ability to repair muscle and reduce delayed onset muscle soreness. Foods that are high in fibre and protein keep you full longer and help lower your blood sugar levels. Finally, lean protein is important, especially if you want to produce muscle – no protein, no muscle.

Lecture halls without borders

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

What role do we Jews in the Diaspora play in securing Israel and the Jewish people?

Some of our community members engage in advocacy, others in philanthropy, and there are those who frequently travel to Israel in support of our brothers and sisters there and the economy.

There are, however, other types of Jews, those whom we call activists – individuals who generally operate at a grassroots level, ready and willing to engage our opponents and/or enemies in the field of battle outside the war zone.

Some of these activists can be found in our Jewish communal offices, shuls or quietly strategizing at home with friends and neighbours.

And then there are a group of Jewish student activists who attend our local and out-of-town universities and colleges, those who steadfastly stand toe to toe and eye to eye with our adversaries and enemies in large, unfriendly central squares and lecture halls without borders.

They are activists by choice and situation, and they do our community proud as they courageously take positions on the front line of fighting anti-Semitism and defending Israel.

An example of the Jewish student activism I speak of was a rally co-ordinated by the students of Hasbara Fellowships, Hillel of Greater Toronto and the Canadian Centre for Israel Activism held on Jan. 18, called Toronto for Israel.

This magnificently proud rally, staged in Dundas Square in downtown Toronto, attracted well over 1,000 people from the Jewish and non-Jewish student bodies, supportive professors (somewhat of an oxymoron) and community members.

The objective of this outdoor demonstration, according to the co-ordinators, was to "demonstrate solidarity with the people of Israel who have endured more than 10,000 Hamas terrorist missiles and mortar shells from Gaza for nearly nine years."

And indeed it did.

With great pride, throngs of Canadian and Israeli-flag-waving Jewish demonstrators listened, clapped and cheered as university student activists sang their praises for Israel, its humanitarian approach to the war in Gaza, and its heroic fight against terrorism. With the gusto and resolve of U.S. civil rights leader Martin Luther King Jr., those brave young Jews raised their voices above the rooftops, on a chilly snowy Sunday afternoon, chanting Am Yisrael Chai – the Nation of Israel Shall Live. Well done!

Throughout the rally, I stood next to a Jewish community leader who filled me in some of the background of the event.

She said the students decided to hold the demonstration because they recognized the need to do so in the face of the world, and in earshot of "the other side." She added it is not always easy being a Jewish student activist, especially when some professors make their anti-Israel opinions known. (To this end, Hillel of Greater Toronto offers counselling services for students who need to talk through their feelings after facing frequently virulent anti-Israel/Jewish sentiment. Support your local Hillel! They are innovative.)

According to Zak Kay, the executive director of Hillel of Greater Toronto since 1995 and recent award winner for a quarter century of leadership with Hillel, "the students felt the outdoor demonstration was the right thing to do. They wanted to take back the streets (from the 'other side'). They wanted to be out there on their terms. They did a great job."

We often wonder where Diaspora Jews stand on the stage of Jewishness and safety for Israel. In many ways, this query is answered by the teenagers we send off to college and university who while there, turn into strong young adults, gracefully and courageously accepting the mantle of Jewish leadership through activism.

Accolades to our Jewish student activists. Thank you for answering this question. Am Yisrael Chai!

CAMPAIGN IN FULL SWING: Israeli Foreign Minister and Kadima party leader Tzipi Livni, left, admires twin babies at a shopping mall in the southern Israeli city of Ashkelon on Jan. 30. A new poll predicts Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu will win 28 seats in Israel's 120-seat Knesset in Feb. 10 national elections, five seats more than his closest rival, Livni, which will give him the best chance of forming a governing coalition. [Flash 90 photo]

Israeli rabbi rejects Toronto conversion

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The son of a prominent philosopher who urged Jews to retain their identity in order to deny Hitler a posthumous victory has had his own Jewish status denied by a Jerusalem rabbinic court.

In a case that was expected to merely finalize a divorce between Yossi Fackenheim and his wife, Iris, a dayan (judge) ruled that Fackenheim's conversion as an infant 29 years ago, performed by an Orthodox rabbinic court in Toronto, no longer had any effect.

Fackenheim, the son of renowned scholar Emil Fackenheim, said the judge came to that conclusion after questioning him about his level of observance and his record of attending synagogue.

Questions status of Fackenheim's son

The decision not only affects his status as a Jew, it also brings into question the Jewish status of many other Orthodox converts, Fackenheim, 29, stated.

"I have friends who live in fear that their conversion may be revoked," he said on the phone from London, where he is studying for a master's degree.

Fackenheim, who has lived in Israel since childhood, said he is appealing the decision on a number of fronts. He has complained about the presiding judge's findings to the Chief Rabbinate of Israel, as well as to a rabbinic court ombudsman and to Rabbi Eli Ben Dahan, director of Israel's rabbinical courts. The Chief Rabbinate has deferred to the ombudsman, who is conducting a review of the decision. Fackenheim has also retained the Israel Religious Action Center for legal assistance.

The irony of the situation is not lost on Fackenheim, whose father, Emil, a Holocaust survivor and a Reform rabbi, posited one of the most influential concepts of post-Holocaust Jewry. Known as the 614th commandment, it stated, in part: deny Hitler a posthumous victory by remaining Jewish.

Book Award Finalist

TORONTO — New Jewish Feminism, a recent book edited by Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, rabbinic director of Kolel: The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning in Toronto, has been selected as a finalist in the 2008 National Book Awards in the category of women's studies, the Jewish Book Council said last week. The awards, sponsored by the New York-based council, have been handed out since 1948.

Shoah Day Marked

TORONTO — The 2005 resolution establishing the United Nations' annual Holocaust Remembrance Day on Jan. 27 entrenches the lessons of the Shoah, rejects Holocaust denial, condemns all intolerance and is a call to action to end genocides in places such as Darfur, Canadian Jewish Congress said in marking the day last week. The day also "reaffirms the UN's paramount role and responsibility in preventing future instances of genocide," CJC co-president Rabbi Reuven Bulka said in a statement.

Offer for Meatpacker

DES MOINES — An Israeli firm has offered to buy Agriprocessors. Soglowek Nahariya made the offer for the kosher meat producer in a filing Jan 25 with an Iowa bankruptcy court, the Des Moines Register reported. Once the largest U.S. producer of kosher meat, Agriprocessors filed for bankruptcy in November. It had been on a downward spiral since May, when U.S. agents raided its Postville, Iowa, slaughterhouse and arrested more than one-third of its workers in the largest single-site immigration raid in U.S. history. The bankruptcy trustee who is running the firm was encouraged by the offer, but said a sale could take months. Soglowek Nahariya, a leading producer of meat, poultry and vegetarian products, is know here for its Zoglo's brand vegetarian products.

Rubashkin Freed

DUBUQUE, Iowa — Former kosher meatpacking executive Sholom Rubashkin was released on bail last week after posting $500,000 bond and being fitted with an ankle bracelet. The ex-manager of the Agriprocessors meat plant in Postville, Iowa, the scene last May of the largest immigration raid in U.S. history, Rubashkin was arrested twice on a range of charges including bank fraud, money laundering and helping illegal immigrants procure fake documentation. A U.S. judge, invoking Israel's Law of Return, ruled that he posed a flight risk and should be detained until trial. His lawyers appealed.

Gaza Appeal Airs, But Not on BBC or Sky

LONDON — An emergency appeal for Gaza aired on British television stations, but not the London-based global broadcasters BBC and Sky.

Police evacuated a group of protesters last Monday night who entered the BBC Television Centre in West London and chanted "BBC Shame on You."

Stop the War Coalition, the group behind recent anti-Israel protests in Britain, is calling on its members to protest the BBC's decision not to broadcast the Jan. 26 appeal by cancelling their TV licence, the annual charge levied on Britons with a TV set and the BBC's main source of funding. The BBC received thousands of e-mails for and against its decision not to broadcast the appeal, with the majority protesting it.

Views have been mixed in the U.K. media. Some commentators not only justified the BBC's decision but also criticized some charities involved in the appeal.

Both the BBC and Sky said broadcasting the appeal would compromise their impartiality. While the BBC, a public broadcaster, has been facing criticism, Sky, a commercial broadcaster, has not been in the spotlight. In 2006, the BBC refused a similar request to broadcast an emergency appeal for Lebanon.

About $1.9 million has been collected for the appeal, far less than for previous, less controversial appeals.

Poll Finds Prejudice

ROME — A new poll found that 45 per cent of Italians harbour some prejudice against Jews. The Corriere della Sera newspaper reported Jan. 26 on the survey, conducted by Milan's Center for Contemporary Jewish Documentation. It identified three forms of stereotypes that coexist in Italy but don't necessarily overlap. Ten per cent of Italians harbour only "classic" stereotypes, such as "Jews are not really Italians at heart" or "Jews can't be trusted," while 11 per cent harbour only "modern" stereotypes, such as Jews control politics and the media or are more loyal to Israel than their home countries. Some 12 per cent held "contingent" stereotypes, largely linked to anti-Zionist views. About 12 per cent held views in all three categories. Italy's president warned of a new rise in anti-Semitism in a ceremony marking International Holocaust Memorial Day, which Italy commemorated with hundreds of events.

Ignatieff gives Cotler advisory role on human rights

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Irwin Cotler says his new post as the Liberals' special counsel on human rights and international justice suits him perfectly and should not be seen as a consolation prize for not being named to Michael Ignatieff's shadow cabinet.

The Liberal leader appointed Cotler, member of Parliament for Mount Royal for almost 10 years, to the new role on Friday.

Cotler, justice minister in the short-lived government of Paul Martin, was human rights critic while Stéphane Dion was leader, and public security critic under interim leader Bill Graham.

Irwin Cotler

Cotler said in an interview that he had requested not to be named to the shadow cabinet, which was announced Jan. 22. Ignatieff had informed him that the human rights critic post would be eliminated because it does not correspond to one in the Harper cabinet, and Cotler felt any other duties on the Opposition front bench would hinder his ability to continue to devote as much time to his many international activities.

"The new post frees me up to do the things that I do best... It's exactly what I wanted," Cotler, 68, said. He believes he will, in fact, be able to expand his work abroad, which often keeps him away from Parliament.

Cotler said he wants to put to rest speculation that he was snubbed by Ignatieff because he supported Bob Rae for the party leadership in 2006 or that the decision was related to Ignatieff's remark earlier that year on a popular Quebec television show that Israel had committed a war crime in Lebanon during its conflict with Hezbollah.

Soon after the remark was made, Cotler's Israeli-born wife, Ariela, publicly renounced her party membership accusing Ignatieff in a letter to the National Post of "a lack of moral integrity, sacrificing facts and truth on the altar of political correctness and personal political gains" in the leadership campaign.

Cotler noted that despite the strain, his longstanding "close personal and professional relationship" with Ignatieff, whose career has also been devoted to the furtherance of human rights, never faltered, and even at the time, he defended Ignatieff's right to his opinion.

Ariela Cotler and Ignatieff have long been reconciled, he added.

Cotler's main projects relating to his new job include trying to gather international support for a petition to hold the Iranian regime accountable for "genocidal incitement," co-chairing the founding conference of the International Parliamentary Coalition to Combat Anti-Semitism in London from Feb. 15 to 17, building a legal case against Hamas for war crimes, bringing sanctions against Sudan for the Darfur crisis, and continuing to represent a number of political prisoners around the world.

"I can continue to do all those things and be wherever I have to be, and the leader is encouraging me to do it," Cotler said.

He was in Israel in an official capacity from Dec. 25 to Jan. 13, spending part of that time in the south while it was under the threat of rocket attack from Gaza.

In announcing Cotler's appointment, Ignatieff stated: "I am privileged to work with one of the world's most respected and recognized human rights experts. Our caucus will benefit greatly from his wisdom and counsel."

Cotler was one of three special advisers named, along with two other Martin-era ministers, Ujjal Dosanjh, who is chair of the new Intergovernmental Liaison Secretariat, and Ken Dryden, who is national outreach adviser, with a focus on working families and poverty.

There are two Jewish members on the slimmed-down 33-member shadow cabinet: Raymonde Folco is the critic for La Francophonie, and Anita Neville is responsible for the status of women.

Taliban and Hamas of one piece

This past weekend we read the sad news that Sean Greenfield, 25, was killed in a roadside bomb attack about 40 kilometres west of Kandahar City. He was the 108th Canadian soldier to die on duty in Afghanistan.

Our sympathies, condolences and tears go out to the young man's family.

It is a hard, harsh and very bitter price that Canada and the Canadian armed forces are paying for the sake of the mission so very far away. In some quarters that price is testing Canadian resolve to maintain and support the mission.

But the case for the mission is clear.

The people of Afghanistan, indeed, in the entire region, need help to free themselves from the brutal oppression of the Taliban.

Last weekend, the Globe and Mail published a story that depicted the nature of that oppression and conversely, the nature of the courage of the ordinary Afghans who oppose it.

In an attempt to close down a girls' school in Kandahar last November, a group of Taliban terrorists threw acid into the faces of a number of girls and teachers.

The Taliban refuse to allow girls and women to be educated or to work outside of the homes. The acid incident was an attempt to intimidate the parents of the girls and the teachers to shut down the school. But the school remains open. The headmaster, the parents and the students refuse to surrender their freedom to the Taliban.

The weekend story echoes a horrifying news brief that appeared two weeks earlier in the Globe and Mail, on Jan. 17. The dateline was from Peshawar, Pakistan, but the story concerned the very same issue of Taliban cruelty toward women.

Two paragraphs from the four-paragraph news follow.

"Last month, a local Taliban commander threatened to kill girls attending classes after Jan. 15 and to blow up schools where girls are enrolled.

"As a result, about 400 private schools are unlikely to open their doors next month after winter holidays, leaving tens of thousands of students with no educational options, the official said."

If there are humanitarian causes on this earth for democratic, freedom-loving, life-affirming nations to support, then surely the liberation from Taliban tyranny is such a cause.

The commitment of Canadian armed forces to this cause is noble, honourable, fully in keeping with our history and traditions and worthy of our support.

The oppressive, subjugating nature of the extremist Taliban is abhorrent to the values that underpin our society.

They are also of a piece with the oppressive nature of the extremist Hamas, though many in the West, especially in Europe, are oblivious to the close comparison.

Hamas leaders abuse their own people. It is widely known that Hamas routinely violates every convention of international humanitarian law and convention: they use their own people as shields; they launch their rockets against civilian targets; they launch their rockets from the homes of their own people; they hide, abuse and exploit public and even religious institutions.

These tactics were exposed a number of times by western correspondents during Israel's war in Gaza. Palestinian and other Arab media do not generally report on Hamas' battle tactics.

The Intelligence and Terrorism Information Center in Israel has recounted three articles by western correspondents.

In a story that appeared on Jan. 26, Jason Koutsoukis, a reporter with Australia's Sydney Morning Herald interviewed a Gazan ambulance driver, who described how Hamas operatives tried to force him to use his ambulance to evacuate them from a battle zone.

In a story in the New York Times on Jan. 19, Ethan Bronner wrote that Hamas fighters "fired rockets in between the houses and covered the alleys with sheets so they could set the rockets up in five minutes without the planes seeing them. The moment they fired, they escaped."

In a story on Jan. 22 in Italy's Corriere della Sera, Lorenzo Cremonesi talked to ordinary Gazans about rockets fired from the roofs of their houses and about Hamas operatives who hid in hospitals. He was told by Palestinians that "the militiamen sought shelter in the administration buildings, and that they used the ambulances and forced the drivers and nurses to take off their uniforms with their paramedic badges so that they would not be targeted by Israeli snipers."

It is astonishing and inherently inconsistent with decency and honesty that the conscience of Ban Ki-Moon, the secretary general of the United Nations, for example, or the many marchers and protesters against Israel seems so little bothered by these outrages – of the Taliban and Hamas both. Their pique seems particularly aroused by and obsessively reserved for Israel.

Canadian parliamentarian and human rights activist Irwin Cotler has written that "Israel does deserve fairness and equality before the law, and before the international community."

To our chagrin and our worry, it receives neither.

Yossi Fackenheim quizzed about his observance

Adding to the irony was that his father "went to the Orthodox so we would not have problems [about Jewish status] down the line. Now Orthodox converts have the rug pulled out from under them," he stated.

Fackenheim is outraged at the ruling and at the presiding judge of the Jerusalem Rabbinic Court, Rabbi Yissachar Dov Hagar.

"He stepped all over my identity and my father's memory," he said. "I think he'd be furious. I think he'd be livid. You know the 614th mitzvah. This is the exact opposite of that. It's the antithesis of everything he ever worked for. It's dividing the Jewish people."

During the hearing, Rabbi Hagar questioned Fackenheim closely when he saw his profile, which indicated he had been born of a non-Jewish mother but had been converted at eight days of age by the Toronto beit din (rabbinic court). He asked whether Fackenheim kept Shabbat, ate kosher food, observed all the mitzvot (commandments) and attended synagogue regularly. He asked when Fackenheim had stopped living an Orthodox lifestyle (it occurred when his mother was stricken by Alzheimer's when he was around 12 to14, though he did have a bar mitzvah at 13). Based on the answers, Rabbi Hagar concluded Fackenheim had renounced his faith and there was no need for a divorce since Halachah does not recognize marriage between Jews and non-Jews.

At the request of Fackenheim's ex-wife and to ensure she faced no future questions about her marital status, Rabbi Hagar agreed to issue a get (divorce decree), but with a document attached that stated the rabbinic court did not recognize Fackenheim as a Jew. The divorce decree refers to Fackenheim as "'Yosef who goes by the name Yossi the convert,' which is a hop, skip and a jump from Yossi the goy," Fackenheim said.

The decision surprised Rabbi Reuven Tradburks, a member of the conversion committee of the Rabbinical Council of America (RCA), an umbrella organization representing 1,000 Orthodox rabbis in North America. He questioned Rabbi Hagar's re-examination of Fackenheim's childhood conversion.

"To look at personal behaviour, to look at the validity of a conversion 29 years ago is highly objectionable," Rabbi Tradburks said.

Current behaviour should have no impact on the validity of a conversion. "Conversion can only be valid or invalid at the moment it is confirmed," he said.

If the convert sincerely accepts Judaism at the time of the conversion and later completely abandons the faith the conversion remains intact, Rabbi Tradburks, president of the Toronto Vaad Harabonim (Orthodox council), added.

Rabbi Martin Lockshin, a professor at York University, said the decision "definitely shows the arbitrary and dangerous nature of the haredi-dominated beit din system in Israel… This type of action is unprecedented in Jewish history and must be decried."

Rabbi Lockshin suggested the impact of the rabbinic court's decision could be far-reaching. "All of the converts converted in Toronto 29 years ago and 39 years ago and 49 years ago and all the descendants of the females among those converts now have to worry that some haredi judge will declare them to be gentiles. This is unconscionable and unthinkable."

Rabbi Avi Shafran, director of public affairs for Agudath Israel of America, said legitimate conversions should be beyond challenge. "What matters is whether the conversion was done properly – including the reasonable conclusion that the convert is undertaking halachic observance. If such a conclusion is reasonably reached by the beit din, the convert is Jewish, even if he or she lapses at a later time. If, however, it seems the convert never had any intention to be observant, the conversion is subject to being undermined.

"It indicates that the single standard of Halachah – which is the sole true unifier of the Jewish people – is being taken seriously by Israel's rabbinate."

Rabbi Tradburks said Rabbi Hagar's decision should have no impact on current and future conversions conducted under Orthodox auspices in North America. The RCA agreed about two years ago to tighten the requirements for conversion and adopt a universal set of criteria that would conform to standards agreeable to the Israeli rabbinate. It has also developed a cadre of rabbinic authorities who are delegated with approving all Orthodox conversions in North America.

However, two years ago, when the Toronto Beit Din was considering adopting the new standards, Rabbi Tradburks told The CJN, "I don't believe there will be changes for child conversions that have already been done."

Rabbi Hagar's ruling likely points to the tension between the Israeli rabbinate and North American rabbis over acceptable standards for conversion. "The Israeli rabbinate did not accept what was the norm in North America for many years," Rabbi Tradburks said.

Until North American batei din changed their standards two years ago to match Israeli practices – requiring converts be Torah-observant Jews – they operated under the influence of Rabbi Moshe Feinstein, who argued that a day school education and a traditional Jewish home would be influential enough to ensure a converted child practises Judaism, even if the parents were not particularly observant.

"The Israeli rabbinate never really accepted that," Rabbi Tradburks stated. "That could be what Rabbi Hagar is challenging."

Complicating the issue was a decision last year by an Israeli rabbinic court that called into question the legitimacy of thousands of Israeli conversions conducted under one of Israel's most respected Orthodox halachic authorities, Rabbi Chaim Druckman.

Despite the high regard for Rabbi Druckman, a haredi rabbinic appeal court last year annulled the marriage of an Ashdod man whose wife was converted by Rabbi Druckman 15 years earlier. The appeal court ruled the conversion was flawed and insincere and that consequently, the couple were never married.

Rabbi Lockshin said the Fackenheim decision should worry the Toronto beit din, which operates under the Vaad Harabonim. "While it is true that the Vaad Harabonim of Toronto has been seriously 'haredized' over the last 29 years, they should realize that even their own semi-haredi conversions are also subject to disqualification from Israeli haredi judges. This is not an idle concern.

"Modern Orthodox Jews and modern Orthodox rabbinical organizations must not cede to Israeli haredim," Rabbi Lockshin continued. "They must strengthen the hands of modern Orthodox forces in Israel and encourage them to set up alternate rabbinical systems that will allow Israelis to circumvent the haredi-dominated system."

Funds raised to build better bomb shelters for kids

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

In a show of solidarity with the Israeli community of Sderot, hundreds gathered here to raise money for better bomb shelters at daycare centres to protect children from Hamas rocket attacks.

Na'amat Canada, a chapter of a worldwide progressive women's organization dedicated to improving the quality of life for families in Israel and abroad, organized a benefit concert titled Stand Strong With Israel, Jan. 25 at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation.

The goal of the campaign was to help the 2,000 children who attend 27 Na'amat daycare centres within Hamas rocket range by building bigger safe rooms, purchasing more emergency equipment and providing psychological counselling for traumatized children.

The event included performances by actor, writer and comedian Deb Filler, Israeli singer Doron Mazar and Beth David's Cantor Marshall Loomer.

Speaking to an audience of about 400 people, the shul's Rabbi Philip Scheim voiced his concerns about Israel's security, which many in the community share.

"When will there be an end to terror? When will Israeli children be able to attend school without fear of having to run to a shelter, without having to spend day and night at times in shelters?" Rabbi Scheim asked.

Thornhill MPP Peter Shurman spoke about the fear young families in Sderot live with everyday.

"Here in Canada, daycare is about playtime, practical and elementary learning, and socialization. In Israel, daycare is about that, plus post-traumatic stress disorder, psychological treatment of children and special workshops to help children deal with what they faced and continue to face," said Shurman, a former CFRB talk radio host.

Israeli singer Doron Mazar is joined on stage by the Na'amat Canada volunteers during his performance.

"Living here in Canada, we often take for granted our freedom to enjoy the simplest things, like walking to a park or watching our children play in a playground. It is easy to forget that there are places in the world like Sderot where those very simple things are a luxury, where parents crave for a time when they will be able to walk their children to school, or take them to a park, without watching the sky for incoming rockets or wondering where the nearest bomb shelter is."

Israeli ambassador to Canada Miriam Ziv, who made her first Toronto public appearance at the event, gave her thoughts about what led to Operation Cast Lead, the recent war between Israel and Hamas in Gaza.

"For eight years, Israeli civilians have been under ongoing attacks from Gaza on a daily basis," Ziv said.

She added that over the years, the primitive Qassam rockets used at first were upgraded to Grad missiles, which are more accurate and can travel farther into Israel, and Hamas has obtained more sophisticated weapons from Iran, which are smuggled through underground tunnels.

"The result was that the lives of almost a million citizens of Israel were disrupted. Children could not go to schools and businesses had to be closed down," Ziv said.

"The feeling in Israel, across the whole country, was that 'enough is enough. We cannot take any more. This cannot continue.'"

Ziv said the goal of the war was to bring normalcy back to the lives of Israelis and to make sure that the illegal smuggling of weapons into Gaza would end.

"This cannot be achieved by Israel alone. It has to be achieved through the work of the international community."

She conceded that while Israeli citizens have suffered, so too have Gazans.

"Hamas, in their blatant disregard for human life, have used the citizens of Gaza as human shields. We have tried to avoid harming civilians and there are many examples where the Israeli air force dumped leaflets into the villages to tell the citizens to leave their houses" from which Hamas militants were firing rockets.

"Israel is entitled to defend itself from a terrorist organization, the goal of which is to destroy Israel," she said, adding that Israel continues to work for the release of Gilad Schalit, an Israeli soldier who has been held captive by Hamas since 2006.

Stark reminiscence of a very dark time

Last Shabbat, more than a dozen armed hoodlums and thugs stormed Tiferet Israel Sephardi synagogue in Caracas, Venezuela, the city's oldest shul, overwhelmed the two security guards, ransacked the place, defaced it with brutish graffiti threats and damaged the synagogue's sifrei Torah. It was the second time in the past month that the synagogue has been attacked.

The physical violence however is the predictable, if also ugly, worrisome result of the rhetorical violence against Jews and the Jewish state by Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez.

In 2002, he described an attempted coup against him as "a Zionist plot masterminded by the Mossad." In 2005, as part of his Christmas address, Chavez said that "some minorities, descendants of the same ones who crucified Christ… took all the world's wealth for themselves." Two weeks ago, during the Gaza war. Chavez again menacingly browbeat the Jews of Venezuela by emphatically suggesting that they condemn "Israel's barbarism." He then expelled the Israeli ambassador and cut diplomatic ties with Israel. Last week Israel reciprocated and asked the Venezuelan ambassador to leave.

Chavez has been an enthusiastic, vocal supporter of Hezbollah, Hamas, Iran and all the other sinister forces intent on eliminating the State of Israel. His open allegiances and brazen rhetoric are an unambiguous invitation – if not actually, too, the directing hand behind – the emboldened hostility towards Jews in Venezuela. Chavez condemned the Shabbat attack on the synagogue, but the statement was seen by most observers as insincere and hollow.

David Harris, executive director of the American Jewish Committee, said on the weekend, "There are strong indications that what we are witnessing is a state-sponsored campaign of anti-Semitic persecution, spurred by both Venezuela's alliance with the Iranian regime and the surge of anti-Israel rhetoric during the recent conflict between Israel and Hamas."

Rabbi Pynchas Brener of Venezuela told the Jerusalem Post that "reason makes us believe that this was done with the consent – if not the instigation – of some central power in Venezuela. I do not know if in this environment there will be a future for the Jewish community here."

With both a trembling stir and the swell of deep outrage in our heart, we note that the attack against the Caracas synagogue is a stark reminiscence of a far darker time in Jewish and world history some 70 years ago in Germany.

We must do all we can to let our fellow Jews in Venezuela know that they are not alone, that we will stand by them and help them should they need our help. And we must also urge the government of Canada to protect the desecration of the Caracas synagogue and the burgeoning culture of hatred towards Jews that inspired it.

25 years ago in The CJN

Former U.S. president Jimmy Carter told a gathering of 1,000 businesspeople in Toronto that Mideast peace would be impossible if Israel and the Palestine Liberation Organization don't modify their demands. Israel's refusal to leave occupied territory and give Palestinians self-determination, and the PLO's refusal to recognize Israel, are key roadblocks, he said.

New wave of Venezuelan anti-Semitism

We wish to bring to your attention our great concern over the current situation of the Jewish community of Venezuela.

Historically, the people of Venezuela welcomed with open arms immigrants from everywhere without any expression of xenophobia or racism. All ethnic and religious communities traditionally enjoyed peaceful coexistence at all times, and Venezuela's Jewish community – dating from the days of Simon Bolivar – was no exception.

In the past, as today, several Venezuelan governments have expressed their solidarity with the Palestinian cause or the Palestinian people. However, since the events in Gaza that began on Dec. 27, the present government of Venezuela has adopted an aggressive and dangerous tone never previously heard, clearly inciting hatred against the Jewish community. The government's supporters nationwide picked up on the government's lead with clearly anti-Semitic expressions – with no effort whatsoever by government to stop them. The expulsion of the Israeli ambassador followed, and, subsequently, so did a final breaking off of diplomatic relations.

Furthermore, there is a well-orchestrated campaign on TV, radio, print and Internet media owned by the government, openly questioning Israel's right to exist, even including publication of such anti-Semitic materials as the Protocols of the Elders of Zion. A group of pro-government journalists is urging the population to boycott businesses owned by Jews in Venezuela.

We ask all Jewish communities worldwide to condemn this campaign against our brethren in Venezuela, and to ask their governments, their national and international media to condemn this racism and anti-Semitism in Venezuela, which is setting a dangerous new precedent in Latin America.

Shifting minds

I heartily endorse the letter-writing campaigns to news outlets across the country with online initiatives such as CLIC and Honest Reporting to get Israel's story justly documented ("War for Israel's image is a CLIC away," CJN, Jan. 29). We must counter the negative image of Israel and the toll that image is exacting on Israel and the Jewish citizens in many countries around the world. The fermenting racism and blatant anti-Semitism that we are witnessing is very disturbing. Holding the media accountable for biased reporting should be of paramount importance to any person who is alarmed by the repercussions of the Gaza war.

There are other ways to enlighten people about the situation. I started an e-mail correspondence, explaining the facts clearly and succinctly and covering much ground with good references and arguments. Individual connection has an immediacy and personal component to it. The result has been an expression of much appreciation from those who I have e-mailed, who now have a greater understanding of a complex situation. If you shift but one mind, you have set in motion a creative, alternative way of reaching more Canadians.

Disproportionate force?

Hamas, like all terrorist organizations, exerts maximum effort to harm its adversary. If it sent only 20 rockets a day across the border, it is because that is all it was capable of doing. If it had the means to fire 2,000 rockets each day, it would have done so, and, if today it possessed the capacity to explode a nuclear device over Tel Aviv, it would not hesitate for one moment to accomplish that task. As far as Hamas is concerned, there is no such thing as an innocent Israeli civilian. At the risk of sounding cynical and uncaring, had the Israeli military used the same maximum effort, Gaza would have ceased to exist long ago and the number of civilian deaths would not be numbered in the hundreds, but in the hundreds of thousands. By this measure, the Israeli response was disproportionately minuscule indeed.

Upset, frightened by CJN column

Jesse Mintz wrote a column for your issue of Jan. 22 about how Israel was wrong in attacking the university in Gaza ("Bombing Gaza university was a bad idea"). It was chilling to read this type of attack against Israel from a Jewish paper when the world of anti-Semites is gathering up forces to try not only to defeat Israel in its puppet world courts and Arab-dominated UN human rights groups, but to try to eliminate Israel from the map. Israel attacked places of terrorist activity during the Gaza war. For comfort and strength, I turn to The CJN, and I find the same kind of propaganda attacking Israel that I have read in other newspapers. It's upsetting, sad and mostly frightening.

Israeli election campaign heats up

By MARCY OSTER
JTA

In an election season compressed into just three weeks due to the military operation in Gaza, during which campaigning ground to a virtual halt, Israel's political parties have begun to roll out their campaigns ahead of national elections on Feb. 10.

The first round of publicly sponsored and legally restricted TV advertisements aired during a special hour of political broadcasts last Tuesday night (Jan. 27). Each party was allotted a specific amount of time based on the number of seats it holds in the current Knesset. Due to flagging interest in this year's campaign, Israeli TV channels have declined to air subsequent broadcasts of the ads during prime time.

Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu is the front-runner, with a widening lead over Kadima, the party now in power.

Kadima has been struggling to raise the profile of party leader Tzipi Livni, Israel's foreign minister. Of the heads of the three largest parties, Livni emerged from the Gaza operation with the fewest gains. Labor leader Ehud Barak received an initial boost from the campaign because as defence minister, he was the architect of Operation Cast Lead.

In the days of criticism that followed the fighting's end, Netanyahu and another right-wing leader, Yisrael Beiteinu's Avigdor Leiberman, saw their poll numbers rise as critics asked why Israel didn't finish the job in Gaza by crippling Hamas.

Livni, however, has benefitted neither from the war nor its aftermath. Cast by critics as largely irrelevant to the war, Livni was not helped by her appearance in the United States to sign a co-operation agreement on security at the very moment that Israel announced the Gaza ceasefire.

With Likud having the most to lose in the next two weeks of campaigning, Netanyahu is playing it safe and warning supporters not to presume victory.

"We still have two weeks," the former prime minister said at a Jan. 26 rally. "Even though things look promising, they are not guaranteed."

If he wins, Netanyahu is expected to reach the 61-seat majority in the Knesset needed to become prime mininster by building a coalition with Labor and smaller parties. On Monday afternoon, Likud announced an alliance with the small religious Zionist party Achi, which is headed by Knesset member Effie Eitam, who left the National Religious Party when it refused to bolt former prime minister Ariel Sharon's coalition over the Gaza withdrawal.

Netanyahu has said he favours pursuing achievable incremental agreements with the Palestinians rather than chasing what he sees as an elusive final-status deal for a two-state solution. He has said he wants to focus on bolstering the "moderate parts of the Palestinian economy" to foster the conditions for political agreement.

On Sunday, Netanyahu was quoted as telling Tony Blair, the Middle East envoy of the Quartet grouping of Mideast peace sponsors – the United States, European Union, United Nations and Russia – that while he would not build new settlements in the West Bank, he would allow the natural-growth expansion of existing ones.

A former finance minister, Netanyahu is also casting himself as Israel's economic saviour, the man to steer Israel through the choppy waters of the global financial crisis.

On Jan. 27, the Sephardi religious party Shas endorsed Netanyahu for prime minister, albeit with caution.

"A strong Shas will ensure Netanyahu doesn't repeat his mistakes," Shas leader Eli Yishai said.

After winning the Kadima primary last September, Livni refused to strike a coalition deal with Shas, insisting she would not be forced into paying off the party with budget concessions. Supporters hailed her for refusing to give in to blackmail. Critics assailed her for not having the gumption to engage in the political horse-trading necessary to form a governing coalition in Israel.

As for Labor, Barak's wartime boost has sagged as Israel's gains from the war have begun to look more dubious. Hamas' leadership appears to have emerged from the war mostly intact, even though the group's infrastructure in Gaza was destroyed by the Israel Defence Forces. And on Jan. 27, an Israeli soldier was killed by a roadside bomb along the Gaza-Israel border, prompting Israel to resume airstrikes in the strip.

In a bid to shore up support ahead of the election, Labor is targeting the Russian immigrant community. On Jan. 27, the party launched its campaign for Russian speakers, with radio election broadcasts that allude to former Russian President Vladimir Putin, who is viewed favourably by Russian immigrants as a tough leader. Barak garnered 58 per cent of the Russian vote when he won the 1999 election.

Perhaps the biggest winner to emerge from the Gaza war is Lieberman, whose right-wing party has been gaining steadily in the polls.

Lieberman, who immigrated to Israel from Moldova in 1978 and lives in a Jewish settlement in the West Bank, has advocated swapping Arab-populated areas of Israel for West Bank areas populated by Jews. He was most recently embroiled in a verbal tussle with Arab lawmakers over claims that they should not be allowed to run in the elections since they are not loyal to the Jewish state.

In what Lieberman derided as an annual election tradition, police on Sunday arrested seven of his associates, including his daughter, as part of an investigation into allegations of money laundering and fraud. The investigation has been ongoing for three years, but has produced no indictments.

The left-wing Meretz Party, which has steadily lost ground since its high of 12 Knesset seats in 1992, said it will attack Lieberman during the current campaign, according to an internal memo sent to Meretz leaders, Ynet reported Monday. The memo urges the leaders to cast the party as fascistic, comparing Lieberman to far-rightist leaders such as Austria's late Joerg Haider.

The Jewish-Arab Hadash Party also is positioning itself as the anti-Lieberman, with a campaign slogan that reads "Jews and Arabs refuse to be enemies. Hadash – the opposite of Lieberman." The party, which currently holds three seats in the Knesset, is trying with an Internet-based campaign to attract young, Jewish voters disaffected from other left-wing parties.

Perhaps the most unusual alliance in this year's election is between the Green Leaf Party, which has no seats in the Knesset, and the Pensioners' Party, which has six. Renamed the Holocaust Survivors' and Grown-Up Green Leaf Party, the parties' prime issues are legalizing marijuana and promoting pensioners' rights, especially those of Holocaust survivors. One of the party's TV ads shows party head Gil Kopatch smoking a joint at the grave of Israel's first prime minister, David Ben-Gurion.

Opinions

Speaker fabricates history

If someone who believed Israel to be "politically and morally untenable" were invited to speak in your city or on your campus, would you not be concerned? I was.

And if this speaker, one week before he visited your area, had, in another centre, accused Israel of "ethnic cleansing" and "apartheid" practices, would you not be alarmed? I was.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

And if this person, when addressing a packed auditorium at your university, implied that the Israel Defence Forces had improperly directed highly flammable "white phosphorus" shells at civilians during its Gaza operation – a charge that has been absolutely refuted – would you not be appalled? I was.

And if this individual, during his speech on your campus, insisted that Israel should acknowledge the "right of return" of Palestinians and then accept "a one-state solution" – code, of course for the elimination of the Jewish state – would you not be outraged? I was.

As part of an eight-city Canadian lecture tour, Jeff Halper spoke at McMaster University on Jan. 21. Born and raised in Minnesota, he moved to Israel in 1973. Listing himself as a lecturer in anthropology who was at one time or another on staff at Haifa and Ben-Gurion universities, he is better known as the co-founder and co-ordinator of the Israeli Committee Against House Demolitions. In this capacity, he has been criticized by such organizations as NGO Watch for demonizing Israel and "grossly distorting the Israeli-Palestinian conflict."

His penchant for twisting facts in order to vilify and delegitimize Israel was very much in evidence during his talk at McMaster. With cunning creativity, he showed slides of Israel and the territories that were deceptively off scale, and he presented population numbers and regional breakdowns that were so aberrant that they were uninterpretable.

But aside from his more obvious calumnies, replete as they were with constant references to Israel as a rogue state that probably ought not to exist, he also steered his diatribe in two directions that were especially abhorrent. Firstly, he charged that the goal of Zionism was, as he put it, to "judaize" Israel (i.e. to erase all presence of Palestinians and Arabs by transfer) – and, in so doing, the "demographic threat could be countered."

Secondly, and even more egregiously, he charged Israel with what he described as "human warehousing," wherein Palestinians are considered what he terms "surplus humanity" that is "to be written off."

That the likes of a Halper should be welcomed on Canadian campuses is unconscionable, and that students and faculty who should know better have given him the time of day is beyond comprehension. The conspiracy theories, deranged assumptions and unsubstantiated claims that are so central to his thesis are inimical to the better interests of rational discourse.

Gaza fallout looms large for next Israeli PM

Few claims were heard here in Israel that the latest operation in Gaza was initiated for political reasons, but now that it's over, it will certainly influence the way people vote in next week's elections.

From September 1992 to November 1994, I was the Israel Defence Forces' legal adviser in the Gaza Strip. It was one of the most exciting and challenging positions that I held during almost a quarter century of service in the IDF's Military Advocate General's Corps.

Yair Lootsteen in Jerusalem

Soon after taking on that position, Israel waged its first major offensive against Hamas, temporarily expelling some 450 terrorists to Lebanon, more than 200 of whom were from Gaza.

Later, from mid-September 1993 until the end of my term, I participated in the negotiations between Israel and the PLO, subsequent to the Oslo accords, at several different venues. I also oversaw the on-the-ground legalities of the first phase of the agreement's implementation – the IDF's initial redeployment in Gaza, when Israeli forces withdrew from all populated Palestinian areas and re-aligned to defend the Gush Katif settlements, as well as the orderly transfer of authority from the Israeli military government to the then-nascent Palestinian Authority.

At the time, I felt I was participating in historic events that might lead to enduring peace with the Palestinians and eventually between Israel and all its neighbours.

During the decade that followed, that dream evaporated. We began experiencing terrible suicide bombings. Critics proclaimed we were just waking from the Oslo nightmare. Prime minister Yitzhak Rabin was assassinated. Benjamin Netanyahu and then Ehud Barak came to power. While negotiations continued and some further agreements were reached, trust between the sides dissipated.

In 2000, when former U.S. president Bill Clinton couldn't cajole Barak and then-PA president Yasser Arafat to reach an agreement at Camp David on some of the most complex issues left out of Oslo, the second intifadah ensued. Suicide bombings became weekly, sometimes daily, occurrences. Guns we'd allowed the Palestinians were turned against us. Hundreds of people were killed. Qassam rockets from Gaza began falling into the western Negev.

By 2004, the IDF and the new security barrier had quenched most threats coming from the West Bank and had brought normalcy back to Israel's cities.

With this backdrop, Ariel Sharon, who'd replaced Barak as prime minister in 2001, initiated a plan for Israel to unilaterally disengage itself completely from Gaza, in the hope that uprooting all settlements and military facilities and turning the entire region over to the Palestinian Authority would kick-start negotiations between the sides. As an indication of his future intent, Sharon's plan included removing four settlements from the northern West Bank.

We remember the heart-wrenching pictures of settlers being torn from their homes by soldiers and police. They reflected the price that Israel's leadership was willing to pay, both internally and externally, to advance the peace process.

We also remember politicians of all colours who promised that they would react swiftly and powerfully to any subsequent attack from Gaza. Many believed that this threat alone would suffice. As we know, it didn't.

Afterward, the Bush administration pushed for elections in the Palestinian Authority. The results were horrific. Hamas won a majority in the Palestinian Legislative Council. A widening rift developed between Hamas and Fatah, culminating in Hamas' violent takeover of Gaza.

During all this time, Israeli communities near Gaza endured an ongoing barrage of thousands of missiles from Hamas and the like.

Israeli restraint ended with a literal boom on Dec. 27, and the rest is already history. Questions of proportionality, civilian deaths, collateral damage and purported war crimes abound. They will keep politicians, generals, lawyers and diplomats busy in the months ahead. So, too, will the means and methods of preventing further missile attacks, particularly by effectively foiling future smuggling of armaments into Gaza from Egypt.

Next week's election will be held in the shadow of this operation, but it also comes on the heels of a new administration in Washington, one looking for novel solutions to the conflict in this region. Whoever wins the vote, he or she will be tasked with navigating Israel through many turbulent waters, but the first chore will be Gaza.

Our leadership will have to be both resolute and creative in dealing with future relations with Gaza – steadfast when pushed to make concessions not in line with Israel's security interests, but also resourceful in finding solutions that will allow Gazans a semblance of normalcy.

Unfortunately, it will be quite some time before we can start dreaming of peace again.

The BBC takes on Oxfam and CARE

In parallel to the military conflict in Gaza, a fierce political contest is again taking place between the Palestinian and Israeli narratives, and heads of organizations that claim to promote charitable objectives are the generals and lieutenants in this "humanitarian" war. In this context, the BBC – which is generally locked in to the Palestinian narrative – surprised both supporters and critics by rightly rejecting requests to broadcast noble appeals on behalf of the victims in Gaza.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

While many aid groups are impartial in other areas of the world, the Arab-Israeli conflict creates a highly charged partisan framework that overwhelms the neutrality expected of charitable organizations. Their focus is exclusively on Palestinian victims, while Israeli casualties from more than 800 rocket attacks during this three-week war (after 6,000 such attacks were launched from Gaza in the preceding eight years) have been erased from this biased image.

BBC director general Mark Thompson understood that "humanitarian issues – the suffering and distress of civilians and combatants on both sides of the conflict, the debate about who is responsible for causing it and what should be done about it – are both at the heart of the story and contentious."

In contrast to appeals following natural disasters, such as tsunamis and floods, this is a political disaster, and an appeal for Palestinians alone would "be interpreted as taking a political stance on an ongoing story," Thompson wrote on the BBC's website in explaining the broadcaster's decision not to air the appeal. (Similarly, the BBC does not accept appeals on behalf of aid to one side or another in other areas of political violence, such as Sri Lanka, Georgia or the Balkans.)

Indeed, for many years, many of the groups claiming to promote humanitarian agendas have been important players in the emotive political debate over narratives and responsibility. Moral claims that accuse Israel of horrendous war crimes, and present Palestinians only as victims are used to justify academic and commercial boycotts, and such campaigns are an integral part of the conflict. Their claims of neutrality, morality and apolitical objectives are disingenuous.

NGO Monitor has reported that in the months prior to the decision by Hamas to end the six-month ceasefire and resume rocket attacks, these organizations issued a flood of one-sided denunciations aimed at Israel. This campaign repeated tendentious (and often highly inaccurate) terms such as "collective punishment," violation of international law, etc.

For example, on March 6, 2008, a group including CARE International, Oxfam and Save the Children published a widely quoted report under the headline "The Gaza Strip: A humanitarian implosion." The authors didn't hide their bias, repeating standard Palestinian political rhetoric, including claims that Israeli policy "constitutes a collective punishment against ordinary men, women and children" and is "illegal under international humanitarian law." The report was wrong on many counts, including allegations regarding the availability of food and basic necessities, which were contradicted by World Bank and World Health Organization information. The fact that Hamas chose to pursue war with Israel – including the enormous cost of building thousands of rockets designed to kill – rather than the welfare of its people was a dirty little secret that was never stated in these reports.

During the three-week war, Amnesty International, Human Rights Watch, Oxfam and others were extremely active in the ideological campaign that highlighted Palestinians as victims and Israelis as aggressors. Their press statements included language that reinforced this narrative, demanding that the "international community must not stand aside and allow Israeli leaders to commit massive and disproportionate violence against Gazan civilians in violation of international law." This ideological bias absolves the Hamas leadership for responsibility in the confrontation that they sought and in which they have declared a victory.

In this framework, the Archbishop of Canterbury issued a plea in support of the charities and in opposition to the BBC's position: "By declining their request, the BBC has already taken sides and forsaken impartiality." But common moral sense – which is admittedly in short supply – supports the BBC's position. The aid groups and self-proclaimed guardians of human rights are the ones that have forsaken impartiality and sided with Hamas in its war against Israel.

Egypt's position on Gaza war aroused Arab anger

Egypt – the first Arab country to establish diplomatic relations with Israel – has played a vital role as a mediator in efforts to stabilize Israel's often tense border with the Gaza Strip. Egypt performed this role before and during the recent war, and is doing so again following Israel's withdrawal from Gaza.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The pro-western Egyptian government was instrumental in persuading Israel and Hamas – which violently seized Gaza from the rival Fatah movement in June 2007 – to agree to a six-month ceasefire last summer. Egypt's negotiator, Omar Suleiman, warned Hamas that it risked an Israeli invasion if the truce collapsed.

When Hamas declined to renew the shaky truce unless Israel reopened its border crossings and lifted its economic blockade, Israel's foreign minister, Tzipi Livni, conferred with President Hosni Mubarak, warning him that Israel could no longer tolerate the Hamas rocket and mortar barrages.

Wilfully ignoring the writing on the wall, Hamas stepped up its bombardment of Israeli communities adjacent to Gaza, provoking Israel to launch Operation Cast Lead on Dec. 27. The first phase took the form of massive air attacks against Hamas' military and political infrastructure, while the second resulted in a long-postponed ground invasion.

With a full-scale war raging, Egypt, in concert with France, conveyed a truce proposal to the combatants under which Israel and Hamas would abide by an immediate short-term ceasefire and the border crossings would be opened for humanitarian aid. In the interval, Egypt would work for a more durable ceasefire.

Egypt's proposal was still-born.

Hamas would not accept a truce unless Israel pulled its army out of Gaza immediately. Israel insisted that border crossings could not be opened until an agreement was reached on suppressing arms smuggling and preventing Hamas from rearming. Israel also insisted that Gilad Shalit – an Israeli soldier kidnapped by Hamas in June 2006 – would have to be released from captivity.

These disagreements were exacerbated by Egypt's objection to stationing an international peacekeeping force on its side of the border with Gaza.

Given the impasse, Israel declared a unilateral ceasefire on Jan. 18, while Hamas followed suit 12 hours later.

Although both sides bypassed Egypt by declaring separate truces, they remain dependent on Egyptian goodwill and diplomacy.

No sooner had the three-week war ended than Egypt invited representatives from Israel and Hamas for ceasefire talks in Cairo.

Israel is seeking a stable truce that will be underpinned by a new mechanism to stop arms smuggling from Egypt through tunnels along the Philadelphi Corridor.

This is of the utmost importance to Israel. Before Israel's unilateral withdrawal from Gaza in 2005, Hamas smuggled several tons of arms and munitions, mainly from Iran, into Gaza every year. Once Hamas gained control of Gaza in its showdown with Fatah, the figure rose to 100 tons per annum.

During the recent war, Israeli aircraft destroyed a great many of the tunnels, but Palestinians began to rebuild them once the Israeli army pulled out of Gaza.

Egypt has promised to crack down on arms smuggling, if only out of self-interest. The Egyptians are wary of Hamas' Islamic radicalism and fear that its links with Egypt's homegrown Muslim Brotherhood are subversive.

Israel appreciates Egypt's promise, but is skeptical about whether Cairo will follow through. Israel has not forgotten that Egypt's prewar record of interdicting the flow of military equipment from the Sinai Peninsula into Gaza was less than satisfactory and, indeed, a source of tension between the two countries.

According to reports, Israel has taken a favourable view of Egypt's request to increase its border patrol force from 750 to 2,250 troops. Israel's chief negotiator, Amos Gilad, has reportedly discussed this issue with Suleiman, but by last week, it was far from resolved.

Some Israeli observers, such as Bar-Ilan University scholars Efraim Inbar and Mordechai Kedar, have yet to be convinced that Egypt – which occupied Gaza from 1949 to 1967 and maintains correct but cool relations with Israel– is sincerely interested in ending weapons smuggling across its porous border.

As they put it, "Israel would be foolish to expect that the Egyptians will act decisively and significantly… An important implication of this reality is that we must maintain freedom of action to bomb tunnels along the Philadelphi Corridor, or recapture it."

Egypt's sincerity on arms smuggling may be questionable, but observers generally agree that Egypt adopted a fairly balanced policy during the war in Gaza.

Just as Egypt blamed Hezbollah for igniting the 2006 war in Lebanon, so Egypt held Hamas responsible for starting the fighting in Gaza. Mubarak condemned Israel for its "savage aggression," yet refused to break ties with Israel, as Qatar, Mauritania, Venezuela and Bolivia did.

When the war erupted, Egyptian Foreign Minister Ahmed Gheit lashed out at Hamas, saying it had foolishly ignored warnings to cease its rocket and mortar fire at Israel.

The National Democratic Party – which has ruled Egypt for decades in an authoritarian fashion – denounced Hamas, accusing it of flouting Egypt's advice to maintain the truce with Israel.

"Instead, Hamas dealt with the situation in a spirit of adventurism and irresponsibility, without taking into account the consequences of its positions," the party said in a blistering communique.

Al-Ahram, the Egyptian newspaper, took a similarly tough line in an editorial. Lambasting Hamas and likening Israel to a wolf, Al-Ahram thundered,"If you can't kill the wolf, don't pull its tail."

As expected, Egypt's anti-Hamas rhetoric was denounced throughout the Arab world, in Iran and in Egypt itself.

The secretary general of Hezbollah, Hassan Nasrallah, called on Egyptians to take to the streets. Iran protested vehemently. In Aden, Yemeni protesters stormed the Egyptian consulate in a show of anger.

Thousands of Egyptians took part in demonstrations, but they were kept in check by the police. Having seen photographs in newspapers and images on television of Mubarak shaking hands with Livni on the eve of the war, they were incensed by the belief that Egypt was complicit in Israel's offensive and was eager to inflict heavy blows on Hamas.

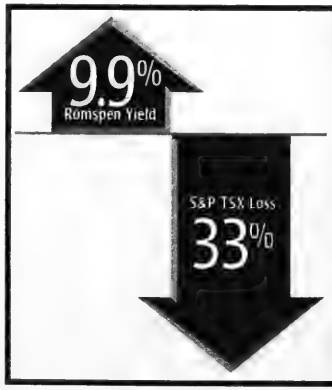
Cairo's decision to keep its Rafah border crossing with Gaza virtually closed was also controversial. It aroused widespread indignation and was largely regarded as an unfriendly act abetting Israel's siege of Gaza. Israel imposed the blockade after Hamas' victory in the 2006 parliamentary elections in the Palestinian territories.

The president of Syria, Bashar Assad, urged Egypt to open the crossing, but aside from allowing a trickle of wounded Palestinians to enter, Egypt kept it firmly shut.

Mubarak announced that the crossing would not be fully opened unless the president of the Palestinian Authority, Mahmoud Abbas, was fully in charge of it on the Gaza side. Fearing the spectre of Islamic fundamentalism, which convulsed Egypt in the 1990s, the Egyptian regime has consistently supported Fatah in its struggle with Hamas.

Egypt's position is reflective of deep-seated fissures in the Muslim world.

During Israel's offensive, Egypt and its allies, notably Jordan and Saudi Arabia, were critical of Hamas. But Syria and Iran, which have supplied Hamas with arms and training, backed it to the hilt.



2008: Another Great Year at Romspen

Many investors now regret that they took on more risk than they realized by overweighting their portfolios with stock market investments. They are now waiting for these investments to recover. But is this really the best solution?

For a risk-averse investment strategy consider the Romspen Mortgage Investment Fund, a leading Canadian non-bank commercial mortgage lender. Since inception and including 2008, investors in the RMIF have earned about 10% per annum. That's not just a paper gain – it's cash paid to investors each and every month. 'Defiant' survivor recounts his tale

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

The recently released Hollywood film Defiance tells the tale of three Polish Jewish brothers who grimly shepherded nearly 1,200 survivors through the woods of Poland, eking out a meagre survival and living with a kill-or-be-killed determination in the face of the Nazi extermination machine.

The film and story were reviewed in The CJN Jan. 1.

Today, Tuvia, Zus and Asael Bielski – the brothers in question – are still heroes to the few remaining survivors who lived through the Holocaust because of the brothers' partisan activities.

Though the survivor generation's numbers are dwindling, there are still those who remember their lot under the Bielskis' protection. One of them is Simon Zelcovitch.

In Toronto, Zelcovitch told The CJN how he, his sister Gittel and his parents were all saved by fleeing into the Bielski-patrolled woods from their ghetto home in Lida, Belarus, at the urgent behest of his older brother, Yossele, who had previously joined with the Bielskis and begun working with the Soviet partisans, impersonating a Nazi to scavenge food for Jews. He was eventually killed in a crossfire shortly after saving his and 40 other Jewish families.

Now 71, Zelcovitch was only four years old when he first set foot in the Bielskis' woodland refuge, but his inner child's trauma, imagery and memories remain intact.

"My experience – and I didn't realize this until much later – was that my childhood had been stolen from me," he said, a sullen look crossing his face. "When I wanted to laugh or cry… I [learned] that I couldn't because I could cause death. So my emotions had to be suppressed completely. I had to be an adult, I could no longer be a child."

Recounting story after story about his family's survival methods among the Bielskis' flock, Zelcovitch fought back tears. And he bristled at reviews and comments in the Polish press following the release of Defiance that suggested the Bielskis were the real menace in the woods, and not the Germans.

"I'm essentially a nice guy, with a very brutal force in me, for obvious reasons," he said, referring to the way he's dealt with anti-Semites during his lifetime.

"I've been taught that first you try to speak intelligently to someone and then allow them to speak in turn," he said. "And if you can't get anything across and they keep spewing out venom, you beat the s–t out of them. Then they become more placid and understanding. That's been my experience, as terrible as this may sound."

He attended Defiance's preview in Toronto last month at the invitation of director Ed Zwick, and although Zelcovitch never personally met the Bielskis during his time in the woods, he said he thought Zwick "did not dramatize anything, though it may seem so to some people. It was very accurate."

Simon Zelcovitch

Speaking to The CJN from Winnipeg, Jewish historian and author Allan Levine, thought the movie "was done very well," though he noted that Zwick played around with the timing of some of the actual events in order to make it all fit.

Levine, who wrote about some of these events in his 1998 book Fugitives in the Forest – reissued late last year and updated with additional information to coincide with Defiance's release – cited both Gittel and Simon Zelcovitch as inspirations for the book.

Levine said the movie has reopened the question of why more Jews didn't fight back against the Nazis.

"Jews were trapped in the ghetto, and early on, no one believed the stories of people being marched to death pits. Who would believe that?" he asked rhetorically. "The main thing was that nobody really understood that the ghetto was not meant to be a permanent solution. Running away and hiding in a forest… seemed far-fetched."

Of the few "happy" moments Zelcovitch experienced in the woods, one has stayed with him as a ritual to this day: stopping to watch the rain.

"I love heavy rain. Because we used to run away from the Nazis' dogs for days so they'd lose our scents," he recalled through tears. "One day, an extreme downpour came, and my sister and I found some shelter beneath an old wagon on a little knoll. As we lay there, breathing easier, I realized it was the first time in a long while that I had some rest and I didn't have to run and be frightened to death anymore."

Zelcovitch said he's instructed his wife and children to wake or alert him, day or night, any time there's a rainstorm. Then he'll go sit on his porch and watch it pour, so he can feel at peace.

The Zelcovitches were liberated from their forest hideaway by a Soviet tank division in 1944.

One day, "a tank came crashing through the woods and came to rest in front of us," Zelcovitch said. "The cockpit opened and out came, what to me seemed the most handsome man, wearing a captain's uniform. He was a Russian Jew and he said to us, 'Menschen! Heint zeit yo frei!' ('Today you are free!')"

Simon and his family walked out of the woods and returned to Lida, only to go on the run again, this time from the threat of living under Communist Russia and its stifling lifestyle. They made their way to West Germany, and in 1948, they were sponsored by cousins to come to Winnipeg.

Once in the freedom of Canada, Zelcovitch said he tried to catch up with his youth and had to relearn when it was appropriate to laugh or cry.

He said he experienced a "desperate need to fit in" and began to study English to blend in with his new environment. His love of the language eventually led him to move to Toronto, where he worked as an advertising executive for more than 30 years.

"I did a lot of writing to release emotions," he said.

Today, he is a semi-retired graphologist – someone who analyzes handwriting – a hobby that turned into a job and something he's done for the past 40 years.

IGTO poster contest focuses on Tel Aviv

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The Israel Government Tourist Office – Canada (IGTO) is sponsoring a "Big Draw" postcard design contest for students at Jewish schools in the GTA to celebrate Tel Aviv's centennial year. The grand prize winner will receive two El Al tickets to Israel.

Oded Grofman, the tourism consul and a third-generation Tel Aviv resident, told The CJN that the contest is "a good opportunity" to bring something creative to the young generation as well as to provide incentive for them to learn about the history of Tel Aviv.

From a tourism perspective, children are often the "trigger" for a family trip to Israel, whether it's a bar mitzvah trip or a vacation spurred by students' interest in seeing first hand what they are learning about in their Jewish schools, Grofman said.

Tel Aviv is a vibrant, diverse city with much to offer visitors, Grofman said, citing its nightlife, restaurants, beach, promenade, museum, opera, concerts and theatre.

As well, he noted, in 2003 it was named a UNESCO World Heritage site for its Bauhaus architecture.

"There's something to do every minute there," said Grofman.

Participating schools are holding their own postcard contests and will select five entries each to submit to the IGTO.

As of last week, about two dozen schools – of which about 60 per cent are day schools – were involved in the contest, according to Jerry Adler, the IGTO's manager of marketing and public relations.

On March 16, a panel of judges will choose three winners, basing their decisions on content, esthetic appeal and effectiveness of delivering a message, said Adler.

Runners-up will receive a digital camera (second prize) and an MP3 player (third prize).

The winning design may be used for tourism promotion, and could be printed as soon as April, when celebratory events begin in Israel for Tel Aviv's centennial year. They will run through 2009.

In 2008, 71,000 Canadians visited Israel, a record, bettering the previous year's tally of just over 60,000, which was also a record, Adler said.

More information about the centennial is available at www.tlv100.co.il.

Torontonians head to Southern Israel to show their solidarity

Mission travels to Sderot, Be'ersheva

By Daniel Horowitz

Four members of Toronto's Jewish community recently shared an experience that none of them is likely to forget. Peter Ekstein, Brad Fox, and Lorrie Kushnir joined UJA's Jeff Springer aboard an intense, whirlwind mission to Southern Israel.

The Toronto foursome split their time between Sderot and Be'er Sheva.

"My personal goal on this mission was to meet as many people living in the south as humanly possible," explained Ekstein. "These people have been living in unimaginable conditions for years now, and I wanted to let them know that we represent a huge community of 200,000 Jewish Torontonians who love them, stand with them, and that we're all part of the same family."

And, according to Ekstein, his goal was met, as mission participants spent time with Israelis ranging from teachers and students to mayors and business owners. At one point, the visitors received a first-hand, all-too-real look at what life is like for Southern Israelis.

During their time in Be'ersheva, alarms sounded, signaling incoming missiles being fired by Hamas terrorists in nearby Gaza. The Torontonians had thirty seconds to find cover.

"Just as I had settled into our van in Be'ersheva, the code red sounded, and I had thirty seconds to make it to a bomb shelter," recounted Kushnir. "They teach you what to do in case it happens, but once it actually did, I felt like a deer caught in the headlights. My feet wouldn't move; my legs felt as though they each weighed a thousand pounds. Finally, we made our way to the bomb shelter, and that was that. But, it made me realize how Israelis live like this every day, often several times a day. I had visited Israeli bomb shelters before on tours, but believe me; the experience is unreal when your life is at stake."

"One of the most powerful moments of the mission for me was when we met a 39-year-old mother whose home had been hit by a rocket," said Fox. "She was so shaken, unable to release the grip that the fear had on her. Her anxiety about her children's safety took a heavy toll on her face. We also spent time in bomb shelters, where children are forced to spend a good deal of their days and nights, and where they are receiving counseling and are offered recreational activities."

"It was significant that we spent our time meeting with the people affected by the war and not just with government officials," said Springer, Chief, Corporate Operations, UJA Federation. "We had a unique opportunity to gain a grassroots understanding, from young and old, of the impact of the rockets.

Jewish Toronto gears up for Inclusive Action Week

According to the provincial government, over 15 per cent of Ontario's population has a disability, and that number is destined to rise as the population ages.

In an effort to raise the profile of inclusion throughout the Greater Toronto Area, UJA Federation's Board of Directors recently endorsed Inclusion Action Week, an unprecedented community initiative occurring in conjunction with a number of Jewish communities across North America.

Inclusion Action Week – chaired by David Green and Daphne Wagner - will take place from February 19 to February 26 across the GTA, and will include a number of special programs including Shabbat Itanu – a Shabbat of Inclusion - Community Inclusion Awards of Excellence, and a Brunch and Film event.

The goal of the week is to promote full participation in Jewish life for people with disabilities and their families within Toronto's Jewish community while increasing community awareness of the needs and concerns of people with disabilities.

"Making our city fully accessible to those with disabilities is absolutely vital, and one of UJA Federation's priorities," said David Koschitzky, Chair, UJA Federation. "One of our most important Jewish values is that of taking care of one another, and this special initiative will hopefully motivate community organizations to take action and to encourage the creation and implementation of inclusive programs and activities throughout the Jewish community as the norm, rather than the exception."

Stan Kugelmass (l), with The Honourable David C. Onley, O.Ont., Lieutenant Governor of Ontario, at last year's Inclusion Awards of Excellence presentations.

Toronto will be joining Jewish communities in Atlanta, Boston, Chicago, Cincinnati, Cleveland, Philadelphia, New York and others.

"Our mandate is to lead and encourage full participation in Jewish life for people with disabilities and their families in order to truly make our Jewish community inclusive. We want to raise awareness, change attitudes and remove barriers," said Fay Rotman, director, Itanu Toronto. "That means promoting an environment where people with special needs are able to fully participate in educational, spiritual, communal, social and recreational activities."

"This is the first community-wide effort to focus attention on inclusion as a fundamental principle of Jewish communal life in Toronto," explained Stan Kugelmass, chair, Itanu Toronto. "Like many Jewish communities, there is wide spread support for inclusion in the GTA, but often a lack of tangible action. We are committed to moving from words to action."

David Cynamon briefed by Israeli President

On a recent trip to Israel to show his solidarity with the Jewish State and to attend the opening ceremonies of his family's latest philanthropic project - a new school in a kibbutz named Ravid in Northern Israel - Toronto's David Cynamon was invited to a private briefing by Israeli President Shimon Peres at his official residence.

Survivor's daughter visits father's school in Germany

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

When Susan Liebel received an e-mail in early 2008 from Ernst Kuhnle, a schoolteacher in Esslingen, Germany, asking about her late father, George Liebel – a Holocaust survivor who fled Germany in 1939 – she thought it was a hoax.

Investigating further, Susan Liebel, 54, a teacher at Thornhill's Willowbrook Public School, discovered that Kuhnle's e-mail was legitimate, and the message was actually an act of outreach by her father's former high school, the Georgii Gymnasium, which he attended from 1927 to 1936.

According to Liebel, he was the only Jew at the school during that period.

"My parents weren't very religious, and they were very assimilated. They spoke no Yiddish, and German was their mother tongue," she said.

After corresponding with the school and exchanging stories and information about her father, Liebel and her family were invited to Esslingen last September to attend a commemoration ceremony – titled "He Was One of Us" – for her father, which included the laying down of a brass stolperstein (block) inscribed with his name in front of the school.

Though her mother was unable to make the trip, Liebel travelled with her husband, Gabor Herczeg, and her cousin, Carie Lemack.

George Liebel, who was a chemist, died of a heart attack in 1981 at age 64.

Stolpersteine have been used since the early 1990s in Germany, Austria, the Netherlands and Hungary to "remind people of those who were deported, killed or fled Nazi Germany," Susan told The CJN in an interview late last year.

Once in Esslingen, she learned that the school had done an in-depth investigation into her father's history and had commissioned the stolperstein at its own cost.

It had also commissioned two other stolpersteine, one for her still-living aunt and one to be laid in front of her grandparents' old home in the town.

Those gestures of kindness and the subsequent trip to Germany last year have left her with many memories and emotions she's still working through, Liebel said.

The town "only had a population of 200 Jews... who were very assimilated," she said. "But by 1932, my father was already marked as 'not Aryan' on his report cards. In 1936, the school's headmaster decided my father would not graduate because he was Jewish. But his classmates spoke out on his behalf and he did graduate."

He then attended the Stuttgart Technical Institute from 1936 to 1938, but after Kristallnacht, he was prevented from continuing his pursuit of a chem-istry degree at the institute.

Liebel said she was astounded at how much information still existed about her father in Esslingen, including old report cards and copies of his wage cards from the Daimler factory – the company he worked for in the 1920s – and from senior residents of Esslingen who were once classmates of his.

Her three-day "action-packed" excursion to the town unveiled a surfeit of emotions and details about her father for which she hadn't planned.

"I was born in Montreal, so I was pretty far removed from the old country," Liebel said, adding that her father moved the family to Toronto in 1971 after the October Crisis in Quebec.

"I had mixed feelings and emotions about being there... seeing where he lived, where he studied, played sports. It was overwhelming," she said. "I told the [Esslingen] children that it's very important not to forget, but that it's also important not to harbour negative feelings, either. It's important to remember history and also be accepting of change."

Liebel said she also preaches the same message at Willowbrook school, where she teaches a unit on the Holocaust to grades 7 and 8 students.

"My father eventually was rounded up in 1940 in England, sent to the Isle of Mann as an enemy alien and then shipped out to [Quebec's] Eastern Townships and interned there for two years," she said, adding that he became the leader of the interns at a prisoner-of-war camp in Farnham, Que., where he initiated a hunger strike to secure better food and conditions for the prisoners. He also fought to have the term "PoW" removed from all the prisoners' files.

Once released, he settled down in Montreal, met his wife, Greta, and started a family.

"The Shoah wasn't talked about a lot in my home. But I've learned from this trip and now tell my students to ask questions of their parents and grandparents when they can, because I now regret not having asked and missing out on [answers] all these years," Liebel said.

THE LEO BAECK DAY SCHOOL
announces the appointment of
ERIC PETERSIEL, RJE
as Head of School, effective July 1, 2009

The Board of Directors of The Leo Baeck Day School is pleased to announce the completion of its comprehensive search for a new Head of School. Eric Petersiel, current Principal of Leo Baeck's South Campus, will take up the post on July 1, 2009, succeeding Interim Director Dennis H. Grubbs.

In 2001, Eric joined The Leo Baeck Day School in the role of Vice Principal of Hebrew and Judaic Studies. In 2002 he was appointed South Campus Principal. Much of the dramatic growth of that campus's enrollment and reputation can be attributed to Eric's vision and leadership.

Eric holds a BA from McGill University and a B.Ed and MA from the University of Toronto; he also holds the title of Reform Jewish Educator (RJE). He lives in Toronto with his wife, attorney Tami Moscoe, and their daughter, Lilah.

The Leo Baeck Day School is the only Reform Jewish day school in Canada and the largest in North America. It is the only Jewish day school in North America to be an International Baccalaureate Candidate School. Founded in 1974, the school operates on two parallel campuses which together serve over 850 students in Nursery through Grade 8.

Reuters shines light on Iran's role

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

A Jan. 28 report from the Reuters news service, titled "Egypt attacks Iran and allies in Arab world," looked at a critical but under-reported development in the Arab world: the growing schism between "radical" players aligned with Iran and "moderate" forces aligned with Egypt.

The Western media tend to focus primarily on Israeli-Palestinian developments, missing many broader stories of what is happening in the region as a whole. To be sure, in one respect, the camera's lens has opened onto countries such as Iraq, Afghanistan and Pakistan. However, insufficient attention has been paid to the role of Iran as an instigator of conflict with Israel through its use of Hamas as a proxy.

The Reuters report (although not picked up in the Canadian media at the time of writing) provided the context.

It began: "Egypt aired its grievances against Iran, the Palestinian movement Hamas and the Lebanese Shiite group Hezbollah, saying they worked together in the fighting over Gaza to provoke conflict in the Middle East."

Reuters cited remarks by Egyptian Foreign Minister Ahmed Aboul Gheit that these parties tried "to turn the region to confrontation in the interest of Iran, which is trying to use its cards to escape western pressure… on the nuclear file."

The story continued: "Aboul Gheit also said that Egypt undermined Qatar's attempts to arrange a formal Arab summit on Gaza earlier this month, arguing that it would have damaged 'joint Arab action.'

"'Egypt made the summit fail… This summit, if it had taken place as an Arab summit with a proper quorum, would have damaged joint Arab action. We can see what others do not see,' he said."

The Reuters report explained: "The wrangling reflected deep divisions between Arab governments. On one side Saudi Arabia and Egypt, wary of the Islamist group Hamas in Gaza, favoured discussing Gaza at a separate economic summit in Kuwait a few days later.

"Diplomats say Egypt resents the Qatari challenge to its traditional role as leading Arab mediator and dislikes the influence of the satellite [news] television channel Al-Jazeera, which is based in Doha and owned by the Qatari government."

One reason that important regional developments are often missing in media reports is that almost all foreign correspondents – hundreds of them – are based, comfortably, in Israel. They often have difficulty getting permission to report from some Arab and Muslim countries, especially Syria and Iran.

And when journalists do manage to enter such authoritarian regimes, their reports tend to be far less critical than when reporting from Israel. Intimidation and being accompanied by "minders" are some factors that can influence coverage.

But nothing prevents an editor in Canada from recognizing the significance of a news service story, such as this Reuters report, and choosing to run it.

Currently, when western journalists visit Gaza, Hamas gives them limited access to the smuggling tunnels, in order to show how Gazans are struggling to import food and other supplies. Occasionally, weapons smuggling is mentioned. Were more attention given to Iran's role, reporters might try harder to investigate exactly how arms from Iran are being shipped into Egypt and smuggled into Gaza.

Another story that deserves attention is the ongoing internecine conflict in Gaza between Hamas and Fatah. Israeli journalists Amos Harel and Avi Issacharoff wrote in Ha'aretz (Jan. 29) that "[d]uring the recent fighting, and following it as well, Hamas executed several dozen civilians. Some of those killed were members of rival Fatah, but others were not politically affiliated." But the problem for foreign correspondents who get into Gaza is finding people who are willing – or able – to speak about such matters.

Mutual respect key when kids become observant

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The phenomenon of Jewish children becoming more religiously observant than their parents can be stressful, but issues can be overcome with mutual respect, says Rabbi Philip Scheim.

His talk drew on his experience with congregants at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation, where he has been senior rabbi for more than 25 years, and on his own background growing up in the Reform movement before starting to attend Orthodox services and classes and take on greater ritual observance in his teens.

Speaking at Beth David, which is affiliated with the Conservative movement, for a Jan. 13 sisterhood program, Rabbi Scheim shared his thoughts on the extent to which newly religious children are justified in what they request of their parents, and the extent to which they have to "according to our tradition, show a certain amount of compromise."

Honouring one's father and mother is "clearly... a primary mitzvah," Rabbi Scheim said. However, he added, if a parent requests that a child contravene a mitzvah that honours God, such as eating non-kosher food or driving on Shabbat, the child has the right to say no, as long as the refusal is polite and respectful.

"What's clear is that a child of any age is not expected to violate one of the mitzvot of the Torah."

A recurring issue he has seen is the refusal of a newly "super religious" relative to attend a simchah in a non-Orthodox environment.

He defended the right of family members not to pray in an environment that is outside of their comfort zone, for example, in a synagogue where a microphone is used on Shabbat.

Having found himself in similar situations, he believes that the need to honour family "far" outweighs the lack of comfort.

His own solution has been to "quietly daven before" attending an event in a Reform congregation.

Newly Orthodox family members who "reject... any kind of rapprochement with modernity" constitute "a small number, but [the situation] is quite dramatic," said Rabbi Scheim.

On occasion, when funerals have been held at Beth David, haredi relatives have stood in the parking lot rather than entering the shul, Rabbi Scheim said. Others have not attended weddings.

But, he asserted, there is no halachic reason for either decision. "It's ill-mannered, disrespectful and often very hurtful to families.

"I've seen enough examples of knowledgeable, frum people who will make a point of attending."

An anonymous questioner, using pen and paper provided for those who wanted privacy, asked if a child was "going too far" by asking that the fridge light be taped shut on Shabbat.

"I don't think it's going too far," Rabbi Scheim said. "You can still see what's in the refrigerator."

In his own case, his parents made their kitchen completely kosher for him, although he said he did not expect that. He was prepared to set up his own "mini-kitchen" or use disposable dishes.

"There needs to be some give and take on both sides.... It's very doable."

JNF Canada helps restore ancient Galilee synagogue

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

THE BIRYA FOREST, Israel – The ruins of an ancient synagogue in the Galilee, one of the earliest to have been discovered, have been excavated and restored in a joint project undertaken by the Jewish National Fund of Canada and the Israel Antiquities Authority.

Standing stolidly in a quiet forest clearing on the slope of a mountain north of Safed and close to Rosh Pina, the synagogue was originally built in the village of Nevoraya after the Bar Kochba Revolt (132-135 CE).

Believed to have been destroyed by an earthquake in 363 CE, it was rebuilt in 564 CE, as indicated by an inscription found at the site.

By all accounts, the synagogue continued to be in use until the eighth century.

More than 30 ancient synagogues have been discovered in the Galilee, according to the JNF.

Constructed during the Roman and Byzantine periods, they share a number of common features, including a rectangular design, interior columns and mosaic floors.

Despite the biblical injunction forbidding imagery, these buildings were decorated with figurative art portraying humans and animals.

French and German scholars in the 19th and early 20th centuries were the first to find the ruins of the Nevoraya synagogue.

Two American archeologists, Eric and Carole Meyers, conducted further excavations in 1980 and 1981.

In preparing the synagogue for viewing, the JNF constructed a gravel courtyard within the interior of the synagogue, a 60-metre path to the site, explanatory signs, ramps for disabled tourists and a parking lot for cars and buses.

Future development plans call for the restoration of the stone mezuzah and the holy ark, and the rebuilding of the walls.

Picnic tables will be placed in an adjacent forest grove.

In another JNF Canada project, the farmers of Kibbutz Mishmar HaYarden are irrigating their fruit orchards with recycled water from a wastewater reservoir.

Since Israel is already using 99 per cent of of its available water resources, recycled waste water is a necessity.

The reservoir has a capacity of 120,000 cubic metres, all taken from treated effluent generated by the kibbutz.

The water is used to irrigate apple, pear and nectarine orchards, as well as pomegranate shrubs.

התיאטרון שלנו

רבים מכם נכחו בהצגת הבכורה ההיסטורית של התיאטרון הקהילתי שלנו, מיסודה ובזימויה של יעל פיינגולד. לפחות אחת מספר לא הצליח להכנס כי הכרטיסים נמכרו כולם שבועות מראש. קרוב לודאי שאפשר היה למלא עוד שלוש או ארבע הצגות של "עיר הנפט" שזכתה לבקורות נלהבות ביותר של הקהל.

הרבה מדברים אצלנו על הצורך לבנות רוח של קהילה שהיא מעבר להתייצבות להופעות של אמנים ישראלים שמבקרים כאן. התיאטרון החדש עשה זאת בגדול. הוא איחד קהילה שלמה בהתלהבות, באנרגיה חיובית ובתכנים ישראליים. יד על הלב- שמענו מעסקנים ישראלים הרבה על תכניות, רשימות, התלכדות ומה לא, אבל חוץ מכתרות בעיתונים- כמעט כלום. וכמו בספרים- את הפעילות האמיתית עשו אנשים שאינם בכתרות וששותפים את הכותרות. בראש ובראשונה- תמי ברמן, גוש אנרגיה צונע ותבונה לכלים, שאינה מבזבזת מילה מיותרת-רק עושה ולא מצפה לתודה. לידה ליאורה כ"א, גם היא בטוריה דראצקל בלתי מתלכלת, שעושה ולא מדברת. ולידן גליה סרטר, שמשלימה את יחידת הקומנדו הזאת ועושה ללא ליאות למען הקהילה שלנו. השלישיה הזאת פיתחה את יעל פיינגולד המנוטראלית לבלות חדשים ארוכים בטורונטו ולחולל את נס התיאטרון.

כשהייתי בחורה של הלהקה התרשמתי עמוקות מאחידת הצוות והחדוה שאחזה באנשים הנחמדים האלה-אני מתאר לעצמי שלאחר רדת המסך הם יסבלו מסינדרום נמילה רציני, שאפשר לרפא אותו רק בדרך אחת- הפקה נוספת.

אבל כדי שזה יקרה-צריך למצוא דרך כלכלית אורוכת טווח להביא הנה את פיינגולד שלא רק על בסיס של התנדבות והקרבה שלה. צריך לקוות שהעסקנים שמרכים לדבר ולהתלהם ימצאו דרך לעשות זאת. ובאותה מידה-לא יקרה כלום אם אנחנו, כקהילה חזק, נשמע ובועטת, נחרוג מהרגליו המנוסים של אגרוף קפוץ, ונתמוך בתיאטרון שלנו.

אבל שישאר בינינו.

על מקומה של האשה

תודה לרחמי יומר על דברי החכמה הבאים:

"כל מה שתיתן לאשה-היא תהפוך לגדול יותר.
תיתן לה זרע-היא תיתן לך תינוק,
תיתן לה דירה-היא תהפוך אותה לבית חם,
תיתן לה מצרכים-היא תהפוך אותם לארוחה,
תיתן לה חיוך והיא תיתן לך את ליבה,
בקיצור-היא תכפיל ותעצים כל מה שתיתן לה.
ולכן אל לך להתפלא....
שאם תתייחס אליה כמו לזבל- תקבל ממנה טון של חרא

מה יהיה

אובמה משרה על העולם אנרגיה חיובית לפתיחה של שנה חדשה, כשהמצב הכלכלי כל כך חמור, וכשאין נראה באופק מוצא לבעיית הטרור העולמי והמוסלמי (שהם היינו הך), מישהו הסיכ את תשומת לבי למשמעות המדהימה של סיסמתו המנצחת של אובאמה: "Yes we can"

שימו לב: "יס", באנגלית זה oui בצרפתית, זה "כך" בעבריה-כלומר אנרגיה חיובית של "כך" בכל השפות.

אבל שישאר בינינו.

Dating lessons from the Red Sea

By RABBI AVROHOM JACKS

At a cocktail party, one woman said to another, "Aren't you wearing your wedding ring on the wrong finger?"

The other replied, "Yes, I am, and it's because I married the wrong man!"

The Talmud makes an astonishing statement about God. The Talmud relates that for God to bring two individuals together in marriage is as "difficult" for Him as the miracle of splitting the Red Sea, mentioned in this week's Torah portion.

Why is God's "effort" to help a person find and marry the "Right One" compared to the particular miracle of splitting the Red Sea?

There are many beautiful commentaries that discuss the reason for this comparison and the lessons that we can learn from it.

My favourite explanation for the link between the crossing of the Red Sea and matrimony requires two brief introductions. These introductions, when understood properly, radically change the way most of us perceive the miracle of the crossing of the Red Sea.

Firstly, many of us mistakenly think that the Jewish People crossed the Red Sea. We picture the Jews beginning on one side of the sea and traversing the water until they reached the opposite side.

A quick study of a map of the region will show that the Jews could not have crossed the sea at all. Their journey took them from the area of Goshen, where they lived during the Egyptian exile, and their goal was to end up at the foot of Mount Sinai, where they would receive the Torah. Both their departure and destination are on the same side of the Red Sea! This implies that they must have entered the sea and exited on the same shore.

Now, picture the path that they would have taken. Since they entered and exited the same bank of the Red Sea, their journey would lead them in a semi-circular arc through the sea.

The second point that we need to explore together is a fascinating midrash that relates how each of the 12 tribes walked along its own pathway. This means that some tribes moved more on the inside of the semi-circular path, while others travelled on the outer edge. Elementary geometry explains that those on the inner edge of the circle were in the sea for a shorter period of time than those on the outer circles, since they had a shorter distance to travel.

In our personal journeys that we embark on to find a suitable spouse, each person spends different amounts of time in the turbulent "dating" sea.

Some spend a relatively short time before they find "The One." Others need to be on the singles scene for longer before they meet their life partner. The comforting message implied by the Red Sea miracle is that ultimately, all of us get to dry land and find our intended.

In truth, not only does this inspirational message apply to singles looking for a match, it applies to all of us who have faced life's inevitable challenges.

Some of us are blessed to overcome our travails relatively quickly. Others may need to face the tumultuous waters for a longer period of time. Regardless of how difficult our challenges seem, we always need to trust in God and believe that He will ultimately bring each and every one of us to the dry, sure shore.

This Shabbat is called Shabbat Shirah – the Sabbath of Song. May we all merit to sing songs of joy when we reach our personal shores of happiness. May we collectively merit to sing the ultimate song of joy when all mankind leaves behind the turbulent waters and reaches the era of peace, prosperity and spiritual growth for all.

Turning toward God

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

In an article titled "Teaching Spirituality in Day Schools and Yeshiva High Schools," Prof. Moshe Sokolow, who teaches Bible and Jewish education at Yeshiva University, reviewed the mission statements of a sample of New York schools and even one in Toronto. Many of the statements skirted around the word spirituality but did include numerous mentions of Halachah, learning Torah, developing the whole child and so on. The curricula weren't organized around dvekut – clinging or connection to God – in almost any way. The conclusion is that we are creating an informed generation of Jews, but not necessarily ones that recognize the God-quest at the centre of a Jew's mission.

Finding God doesn't occur ex nihilo. It's an art we need to cultivate in our children when they're young, as synagogue congregants, on a consistent basis. We have actual letters from the Second Temple period that convey what kind of feeling the Temple evoked. One such letter remarks that one who sees the Temple and its priests "will come to astonishment and indescribable wonder, and will be stirred by the holy quality which pertains to every detail." Synagogues are called mikdash me'at (a miniature Temple), but do they create a microcosmic version of this experience?

Is finding God a priority in our educational system? Does the value of feeling dvekut influence the curricula of our schools? Do our teachers communicate that this is an important notion? Does the tfillah that takes place in our schools teach our children the essence of connecting to Hashem?

Each person can answer these questions in their own way, and each individual Jew can continue that quest privately as well. It's remarkable to consider how small things can be helpful in this area.

The following was written by Rabbi Ed Feinstein, who has a large Conservative congregation out in California. "We North Americans are insane. Eleven p.m. every night, we snuggle up, ready for bed, and what's the last thing we do? We switch on the evening news. Thirty minutes of murder, brutality, corruption, catastrophe, moral lunacy, sports and weather. Good night. And then in the morning we are awakened by the clock radio set to some news station. And we begin the day with… murder, brutality, corruption, catastrophe, moral lunacy, sports and weather. And you want to know why you're depressed?"

Mitzvah, at least in theory, is not about habit, nor is it about drudgery. Mitzvah is a reminder that we are alive for a short time and we have an opportunity to seek out the highest of heights.

For two minutes at the end of each day, we can firmly click off the television, Internet, telephone, rush of appointments and loud noises of the world and turn toward God.

We can say Shema slowly and luxuriously. Every night. We can rise and do the same thing. We can be mindful of who we love and how we are going to talk today. We actually have the time. We just need the will.

Jewish Life

A many-sided novel

The World to Come, by Dara Horn. W.W. Norton & Company.

Books
Bernard Baskin

This unusual, many-sided novel was inspired by a real-life art theft from a Jewish museum in Manhattan some years ago. The painting by Chagall, Over Vitebsk, depicted a bearded Jew floating over the skyline, over the housetops of a rural village. The figure seems to be walking, unaware that he is actually in flight.

When Ben Ziskind visits the museum one day to participate in a social singles mixer, he is astonished to see the familiar Chagall, which he is certain used to hang on the living room wall of his parent's home in New Jersey.

In the wake of his mother's recent death and the collapse of his marriage, Ben is angry and disturbed. In a moment of irrational rage and convinced of the provenance of the painting, he wrenches it from the wall and runs.

Where did the painting come from? The author goes back in time to a Jewish boy's school in Malakhovka, set up by the Soviet authorities for orphaned children. In an impetuous moment, Chagall, who was a teacher at the school, gave the painting to a promising student, who in time turns out to be Ben's grandfather. We follow the boy and the painting through several traumatic generations of change and suffering.

Another teacher at the school was the Yiddish writer who went by the one name Der Nister (the hidden one). Chagall manages to leave the Soviet Union, to enjoy both fame and fortune. Der Nister unhappily remains relatively unknown, a figure of deprivation, poverty and abuse.

Mixed into the complex plot are Yiddish short stories, homilies and parables, including some by I.L. Peretz, Shalom Alecheim and Der Nister.

The author, who received her PhD degree from Harvard in the field of Yiddish and Hebrew literature, makes creative use of Jewish folklore and mysticism, most notably the tradition that before we are born we know all the secrets of the world, but at the moment of birth an angel presses a finger to our lips and we forget everything we knew. This angelic action explains the dent beneath our noses.

Ben eventually falls in love with Erica, a member of the museum's staff who has discovered the secret of the painting and knows that Ben is its thief.

A terrorist act, a truck loaded with explosives, turns the Jewish museum into an inferno. Ben enters the tottering building in search of Erica. His fruitless attempt ends in semi-consciousness. "He slipped in the mud again, pawed at the walls, pulled himself up to stand, and reached for the doorknob. 'Erica?' he called, and listened for her answer. And then he opened the door and entered the world to come."

Babies figure prominently in much of the book's folklore. At one point the author strives to imagine a state of existence where the unborn undergo a series of immersions in pools of water: the pool of ice-filled hate, the cold still pool of grief, the pool of warm friendship and finally, the pool of love.

The bathhouse attendant explains, "Once you are born you might feel all the things into the world to come… I hope it never will. But if it does, I want you to be prepared."

Beautifully written, symphonic in its layers of the real and the imaginary, combining elements of mystery, romance, theology and folklore, The World to Come is an engrossing literary adventure.

The Tu b'Shvat seder, Part 2

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Are you ready for the seder?

No, not that seder. Although it is far less famous than the one in the spring, Tu b'Shvat does have its own traditional seder. And like the one on Passover, the Tu b'Shvat seder is centred around food and is rich in symbolism both mystical and environmental. Today, a look at the Tu b' Shvat seder.

In the 16th century, the Kabbalists of Tzfat compiled a Tu b'Shvat seder that involves enjoying the fruits of the tree, particularly those native to the Land of Israel, and discusses philosophical and kabbalistic concepts associated with the day. According to the Aish HaTorah educational site, the seder is a great way to appreciate the bounty that we so often take for granted. [tinyurl.com/seder03]

Yitzhak Buxbaum's kabbalistic Tu b'Shvat Seder draws upon the teachings of the Talmud, the Baal Shem Tov, the Arizal and other Jewish mystics. For example, we learn that we are actually held accountable for not eating a new fruit when presented with the opportunity. Why? "Because each life form, even fruit, is entrusted to a specific angel. By saying a blessing over a fruit, we empower that angel to reproduce more of that fruit. One who refrains from partaking of a fruit deprives the world of the spiritual influence that the blessing would have provided." [tinyurl.com/seder08]

As well, there's Rabbi Yonah Bookstein's A Kabbalist's Feast. [tinyurl.com/seder07] Jerusalem's Diaspora Yeshiva's Mystical Seder for the New Year of Trees calls for 22 foods, including red and white wine, olives, dates, walnuts, carobs, pistachios, azaroles, quinces and hackberries. (You can substitute similar fruits.) [tinyurl.com/seder11]

Tu b'Shvat is also the perfect time to assess how Judaism treats the environment. In Deuteronomy 20:19, we are told that when an army lays siege to a city, it must not destroy its fruit-bearing trees. [tinyurl.com/seder01] Eilon Schwartz of Jerusalem's Heschel Center for Environmental Learning and Leadership analyzes this commandment against wanton destruction of trees and explains how humans are both responsible for – and dependent on – trees. [tinyurl.com/seder04]

The Coalition on the Environment and Jewish Life (COEJL) continues that theme. "This Tu b'Shvat, as we eat of the fruit of the earth and celebrate with friends and family, let us consider how we each can tread more lightly on Earth, how we can help our Jewish institutions to practice more fully Judaism's environmental traditions, and how we all together can motivate our government to tend the public lands we all share." [tinyurl.com/seder05] The COEJL seder is titled The Trees Are Davening. [tinyurl.com/seder10] Elizabeth Schaumberg adapted another environmental seder for the Pritzker Center for Jewish Education in Chicago. [tinyurl.com/seder02]

For yet more variations, there is Rabbi Yossi Michalowicz's Tu b'Shvat Seder [tinyurl.com/seder09] and Ari Davidow's Tu b'Shvat Seder Toolkit. [tinyurl.com/seder12]

For the past few years, the Global Tu b'Shvat has held a high-tech variation by joining Jewish schools around the world via videoconference, including Toronto's Bialik Hebrew Day School. [tinyurl.com/seder06] Two years ago, they were joined by Leon Blum at the NASA's Johnson Space Center in Houston. He explains research being conducted to grow produce in space. [tinyurl.com/seder13]

If you are hosting a seder, then you'll need to know what to put on the table. Some people may prefer to go minimalist and focus on almonds, dates, figs, raisins and (what always seems rock-hard) carob. If you want to put a bit more work into celebrating the holiday, here are some recipes to try out – Sephardi "Prehito" Bulgur Pudding followed by Dates Stuffed with Lamb and Compote with Spiced Wine. Top it all off with Walnut Carob Halvah. [tinyurl.com/seder15]

The Tu b'Shvat Recipe Index recommends Seven Species Salad (Salat Shivat HaMinim), Persian Date Halvah, Uchpolo (Bucharan Rice) and, if you have room, 180 others. [tinyurl.com/seder16] I like Roberta Kalechofsky's trendy-sounding Eco Compote, which is composed of dried fruits boiled with sugar and honey and topped with Tofutti "ice cream." [tinyurl.com/seder19]

And to top it all off, there's even a Tu b'Shvat Fruitcake, which thankfully "is lighter than the classic version."

Campuses hostile to Jewish students, panel says

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The Jewish community needs to take universities back from anti-Israel student groups who have created an atmosphere on campus that is hostile to Jewish students and supporters of Israel, says Sean Egan, a University of Toronto medical professor.

Egan, along with Lawrence Hart, a McMaster University medical professor, and Orna Hollander, executive director of the Canadian Israel Advocacy Centre, led a Jan. 21 discussion at the law offices of Cassels Brock & Blackwell titled Defending Freedom on Campus.

It was sponsored by the Canadian Jewish Civil Rights Association and the Speakers Action Group to address concerns about anti-Israel groups that have been organizing "Israeli Apartheid Week" (IAW) events every year since 2004.

Egan, who is Catholic, said it's unfair to characterize Israel as an apartheid state, because Israeli Arabs are allowed to vote, they have seats in the Knesset, their own newspapers, sit on the Supreme Court, teach in Israeli universities, and practise medicine in Israeli hospitals.

He said that when Israel declared its independence in 1948, more than one million Jews from surrounding Arab countries were expelled from their countries and had their property confiscated, and Jewish communities, which had been in existence for more than 1,000 years before the Arab conquest of the lands, were cleansed of Jews.

"It is particularly ironic that [U of T's] Arab Student Collective libels Israel as an apartheid state when Arab countries are effectively Judenrein," Egan said.

"This is more that an issue of unpleasantness on campus. The IAW comes at a time when Israel is being threatened with nuclear annihilation by Iran and Israel is under constant attack from terrorists targeting civilians."

Hart spoke about an incident last year when the Jewish Student Association (JSA) complained to McMaster's administration about a banner that was put up by IAW organizers. It depicted a Palestinian youth who was standing next to an Israeli soldier holding a blood-drenched Israeli flag.

Public forum, rally turned into a 'hate-fest against Israel'

The decision by the McMaster administration to have the banner removed prompted the organization of a public forum and rally "in the defence of free speech," which turned into a "hate-fest against Israel," Hart said.

"After the forum, out came the banners that read, 'Viva Intifadah, Death to Israel, Death to Jews.'"

He said that while the JSA did file an official complaint against the university for allowing the incident to take place on campus, a hate crimes police officer in Hamilton, who was not Jewish, asked, "'Where is the Jewish community? Why are they not doing anything?' And he took it under his own volition to put in a complaint to the Attorney General of Ontario, pulling together all the aspects of what happened at McMaster," Hart said.

He said that the complaints, both to the university and the attorney general have yet to be settled.

Hart criticized some Jewish community groups that practise "soft activism."

"There needs to be a much stronger emphasis on action rather than this passive approach."

Hollander said that the hostility and intimidation that pro-Israel students feel has reached classrooms as well. Regardless of whether students are enrolled in sociology, biology or history courses, professors and students use class time to condemn Israel.

In addition to the numerous rallies and demonstrations that take place on campuses throughout the year, many anti-Israel activists are on student councils, she said.

"Many past presidents and VPs are actually leaders of the anti-Israel movement, and as we speak, there is a York University student council meeting, and on the agenda today is the situation in Gaza and what resolution they are going to be passing as a result of that."

On Jan. 21, the York Federation of Students passed a motion condemning Israel for its war against Hamas, calling it "the single largest massacre in Gaza."

University administrations are choosing to stay out of the on-campus conflict "because they are intimidated as well," Hollander said.

"Sometimes the administration's decision not to be involved really puts our students in a bad place. They are told by the administration that they can't be helped, and many times our community is at a loss as to how to be a resource for the students."

Hollander suggested that those who make large donations to universities, do so on a condition that the schools work to better protect Jewish students from intimidation and anti-Semitism.

"We have many people that donate to universities without strings attached… I don't know why people agree to give millions of dollars to a campus that doesn't do its part in ensuring the safety of our students."

Egan agreed with Hollander, saying that "publicly funded institutions are being taken over and used to destroy our freedoms, and I think that the university system and the media are places where we all spend a huge amount of money and those are at the forefront of anti-Semitism in Canada and the western world. I think we need to take them back, and the only way to take them back is to put some strings on the public money that universities are going to depend upon."

Egan added that in no other subject area would a university justify the dissemination of falsehoods on the basis of free speech.

"I don't think there would be support for free speech if these people were promoting… misinformation about various principles of physics, so why is it acceptable to teach misinformation [about Israel] on the taxpayer's dollar?" he asked.

Hart suggested that legal avenues be explored.

"Putting the administration into the fire with the threat or the prospect of a possible lawsuit against them for not protecting their students… I think that is something to think about."

Max Eisen, a prominent Holocaust survivor who was in the audience, commented that the Jewish community needs to be more proactive.

"Where are the Jewish brains who can think about how to go about these things? Why are we fighting our battles in pieces, different groups at a time? Why don't we come together?" Eisen asked.

"All these things start with words, and believe me, it is not going to get better. This is not only about Israel, it is about all of us here in North America. They are going to come after us," he said.

"It is not just about Israel, but if something happens to Israel, we are all done for."

Winnipeg seniors centre restricts public forums

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — In a move to keep out a Jewish group that's critical of Israel, a Jewish seniors centre here has barred any public forums except those sponsored by the centre itself or its owner, the National Council of Jewish Women.

The Gwen Secter Creative Living Centre, a north Winnipeg seniors centre that celebrated its 25th anniversary last spring, instituted the new policy Dec. 18.

The United Jewish People's Order (UJPO) – a left-wing secular humanist organization founded in 1926 that's highly critical of Israel and had been holding programs at the centre since 2005 – claims the new policy is intended primarily to keep out its political programs.

UJPO's dispute with Gwen Secter began in late May 2007 and relate to a forum on Israel planned for early June, UJPO's president, Roz Usiskin, said in a letter to the Jewish Post and News in Winnipeg. The subject was to be Israel's war with Hezbollah in 2006.

"On May 26 [2007]," she wrote, "after publicity was underway, we received a phone call from Gwen Secter staff that the UJPO forum on Israel could not be held on their premises. In a subsequent letter dated June 7, '08, [Gwen Secter] stated that their decision was made 'after it was brought to our attention about the controversial nature of the discussion and the potential for criticism of the State of Israel.'"

In a letter of response on June 28, UJPO suggested that in future, in order to avoid difficulties, the Gwen Secter Centre might consider a disclaimer policy for renters, stating that the centre isn't responsible for the views expressed by the renters or their speakers.

"This policy is common practice in the media and in public buildings," Usiskin said. "This proposal appeared to resolve the issue."

However, in a letter on Aug. 28, 2008, the Gwen Secter board wrote that UJPO public forums can no longer be held in the Gwen Secter Centre building.

When UJPO members asked for an explanation, they received a second letter from the Gwen Secter board, on Sept. 18, stating that there had been phone calls from prominent members of the Jewish community in Winnipeg strongly objecting to UJPO being permitted to hold public discussion forums in the building owned by the National Council of Jewish Women (NCJW).

As well, the community members suggested that the nature of UJPO's discussions casts aspersions on Israel and, therefore, may be contrary to NCJW's goals and ideals.

The community members also said the disclaimer about the opinions of groups that meet in the facility wasn't satisfactory.

"Opinions about the actions of the Israeli government are not monolithic within this community," Usiskin wrote in her letter to the Post.

"We feel that this decision by the Gwen Secter is part of an effort to prevent alternative viewpoints, to stifle debate and control discussion on important issues that matter to Jews here and in Israel. We believe that the exchange of views strengthens a community… This decision casts a negative light on the Gwen Secter board and the 'prominent' people who pressured the board. It harms our institutions and community and stifles intelligent dialogue."

The leftist group is now seeking another venue for its activities and hopes to continue its work in the city's north end, Usiskin wrote.

UJPO springs from Winnipeg's Jewish socialist/Communist tradition. For many years, the leftist organization held all its public forums and other activities at the Na'amat Hall on north Main Street, several blocks north of the Gwen Secter Centre.

In the fall of 2005, after Na'amat's decision to leave its rented premises and move to a smaller office, UJPO approached the centre about holding its programs there.

"Our membership was growing," Usiskin said in her letter. "We decided to move our activities to the Gwen Secter Centre to benefit from their larger and better facilities.

"When we applied to Gwen Secter, we informed them of our various activities, explaining that our main programs over the years were a series of monthly public forums on a variety of subjects, including Jewish cultural topics, health issues, aboriginal affairs, Canadian politics – federal, provincial and city – as well as forums on Israel."

Usiskin said UJPO's forums are educational. "Information and ideas are exchanged," she wrote. "No one is prevented from giving his or her views and discussion is encouraged. The tradition of the Jewish people is to engage in scholarly debate and critical inquiry. Our history and traditions have taught us to pursue the cause of social justice and human rights, excluding no one. That is the history of the Jews in Winnipeg whose participation in the struggle for what is right for all is legendary."

She said that UJPO brought a new North End Jewish Folk Choir to the centre, as well as an annual Warsaw Ghetto memorial program, both of which Gwen Secter agreed to co-sponsor. UJPO members also joined the centre and participated in its programs.

Usiskin was on vacation and not available to comment directly for this article.

Rose Aziman, president of National Council of Jewish Women in Winnipeg, and representatives from the centre declined to comment on the situation.

But Gwen Secter co-president Menorah Waldman has resigned from her position to protest the new policy.

"I believe that all facets of the Jewish community should be welcomed at the centre," Waldman said.

Personal finance guide born from a once-lavish lifestyle

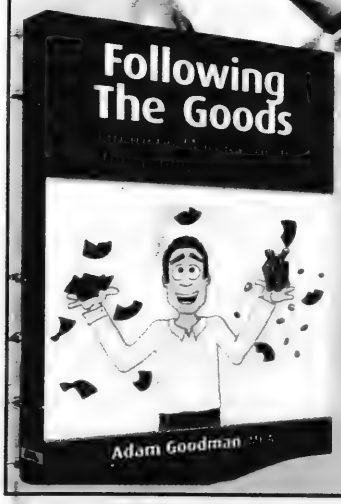
By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

"It has taken me 28 years to learn the value of a dollar," wrote Adam Goodman in his personal finance guide. Following the Goods: Financial Management for the Young and Ambitious, which he hopes will help students and young professionals learn from his money-managing mistakes.

"When I think of all the money I've wasted, I finally realize that if I had done things differently, I probably wouldn't be living in my mom's basement right now, asking my parents to help me lease a car."

The 29-year-old Schulich School of Business graduate, who grew up in the affluent suburb of Thornhill and currently works in the telecommunications industry, said he got the idea for the book, which is self-published, when he realized that although he had been working since he was 15, he never saved a penny.

Adam Goodman



"I met a friend at school who had managed to save more than $50,000, and at the same time, I had managed to save nothing," Goodman recalled.

He said learning about financial management wasn't part of the curriculum when he was growing up, and he didn't have regular conversations about money with his parents.

"It is kind of ironic that both my parents are involved in the financial services in one way or another, but they never actually sat me down and had an in-depth conversation with me. Everyone just thought I would pick it up."

He said that since he started working as a teen, his cash flow was never an issue.

"I was always making good money doing whatever I was doing, whether it was in the dot-com boom days or before that in high school working part time."

He said when he was 19, working at the tail end of the dot-com boom, he was making more than $100,000 a year.

"But I didn't have a concept of saving because my parents weren't looking into my bank account and they never saw whether I had money or not."

Goodman said he would blow his money on clothes, expensive dinners and electronics.

"I made a lot of silly decisions. Probably one of the worst is that I owned a car for only three months."

He said he bought a sports car, a Honda Prelude, and within three months, he traded it in for a Ford Explorer.

"I rolled the loss I took on [the Prelude] into another car loan."

He said that although he was able to complete an undergraduate program debt free, he didn't manage to save any money, and he was forced to rack up a $60,000 debt taking loans for graduate school.

A meeting with a fellow grad student, one who was two years younger than he was and yet still managed to save $50,000, inspired him to educate himself about financial management by reading books and speaking to professionals.

"I'd say the most valuable lesson I've learned is that there is no such thing as a silly question... Some of the reasons why I didn't start making proper financial decisions and start thinking about it was because I was scared of asking why. I was scared of finding out the answer," Goodman said.

He decided to share his newfound wisdom with other young adults through his book, which offers advice about personal financial management through his life experiences.

Although Canadians are suffering through a recession right now for the unforeseeable future, the advice he would give today is that exact same advice he would give two years ago.

"Create a budget and stick with it. No matter what you do, you have to have a budget because... it will help you allocate your money to help you save, so that you're not spending 100 per cent or 150 per cent of what you make," Goodman said.

"Even if you're buying a Starbuck's [coffee] a day for example, it is important to include that in your budget, because it could add up to more than $500 for the year."

He said it is important to start saving early and as soon as possible.

"Regardless of whether you are eight years old, 20 years old or 45 years old, if you haven't started saving, start now because the sooner you start saving, the more it will grow."

Another important tip, Goodman said, is to pay yourself first before you pay your creditors.

"Just make sure that you pay yourself 10 per cent of what you make and put that into savings," he said, adding that it doesn't matter whether the 10 per cent goes into a savings account or an RRSP.

"If you don't pay yourself now, you never will."

An excerpt from Goodman's book reveals that as of this year, the Canadian government implemented the Tax-Free Savings Account (TFSA).

"This is a new type of savings vehicle which will help individuals who contribute to the TFSA grow their savings tax-free throughout the lifetime of the account. The TFSA is not meant to replace the RRSP, but rather to compliment it. The RRSP is meant to help you plan for retirement, while the TFSA is designed to help you plan for life's big purchases."

It is also important for people to set financial goals for themselves, Goodman said.

"Let's say you're 19 years old and you're graduating from school in one or two years, and you think, 'I want to buy a house one day.' You have to start planning for it. You need a down payment."

Regardless of whether you put five per cent or 25 per cent down on a house, it'll still be in the tens of thousands of dollars, he added.

Parents can also help their children start on a road to a healthy financial future by starting a conversation with their kids at an early age.

"Even if it's setting up a bank account and putting in $5 a month, which my parents did do when I was younger, make sure that you continue that conversation into their teens."

Goodman said that while saving money is important, people also need to find a balance between saving and spending.

"There is a balance there. It is not about saving all your money, and it's not about spending all your money. It's finding an equal balance and enjoying life and managing finances."

One per cent of inspiration goes a long way

Life Coach Corner
Judy Siblin-Librach

You know the expression, "It's one per cent inspiration and 99 per cent perspiration"?

Well, normally I would focus on the 99 per cent perspiration and how it takes a lot of hard work, commitment, focus and energy to make things happen. And there is no question that it all begins with hard work and, for lack of a better word, "perspiration." But for the purposes of this column, I want to focus on the word "inspiration," because that's where the most joy, happiness and meaningful living all begin.

Inspiration. What does it mean to be inspired and to live and an inspired life? Well, according to Dr. Wayne W. Dyer, in his book Inspiration: Your Ultimate Calling, "when you are inspired... dormant forces, faculties and talents become alive, and you discover yourself to be a greater person than you ever dreamed yourself to be."

Also, when you are inspired, "your mind transcends limitations," an important concept that means you can achieve things you never thought possible.

Where a lot of people get stuck is they don't know where to begin. One of Dyer's theories is that "sharing is inspiration," meaning we have to become the kind of person who is more interested in sharing than in receiving, and by doing so, we move closer toward inspiration.

He writes: "I speak here of an inner transformation in which extending love outward is our predominant disposition. This can take the form of a silent blessing toward someone we may have previously judged, a loving greeting, a kind remark, or a thought wishing the highest good for all concerned. As simple as it sounds, this is the ultimate impetus for feeling inspired."

A great way to become inspired is to find a quiet corner, meditate, breathe and just be still. Also, it's very important to stay open to all the possibilities and begin with the end in mind, meaning as Dyer says, "the answer to 'how' is 'yes.' You may never know exactly how you are going to accomplish the feeling of inspiration, but by saying yes! to life and to all that calls you, the 'how' will take care of itself."

Dyer talks about the principles that will lead you to a more inspired life. They include Being Independent of the Good Opinion of Others and Staying Detached from the Outcome, which means, for example, to write the book not so it will be a bestseller, but just to be "in your bliss writing what you believe and trust that it will all unfold as it should." My personal favourite principle is Don't Die Wondering. It is one of my favourites because it suggests that if we stay in action, we will never be full of regrets that we didn't follow our ultimate calling.

Leading a life of simplicity is another one of the principles in Dyer's book. His theory is that by simplifying your life, you will make way for more peace, love and joy, and ultimately by using 12 tools, you will be able to hear the call of inspiration.

The 12 tools are:

- unclutter your life;
- clear your calendar of unwanted and unnecessary activities;
- be sure to keep some time free;
- make time for meditation and yoga;
- return to the simplicity of nature;
- learn to put distance between you and your critics;
- make time for play;
- look after your health;
- slow down;
- do everything you can to eliminate debt;
- don't make money your guiding principle;
- and always remember your spirit.

In another fabulous book called A Whole New Mind: Why Right-Brainers will Rule the Future, the very popular Daniel H. Pink talks about creating an inspiration board. He says, "When you're working on a project, empty your bulletin board and turn it into an inspiration board. Each time you see something that you find compelling – a photo, a piece of fabric, the page of a magazine – tack it to the board. Before long, you'll start seeing connections between the images that will enliven and expand your work."

Find inspiring people to study and to be around and, also, you be an inspiration to others. But mostly, inspiration comes when you are not racing around and when you are quiet. In Eckhart Tolle's Stillness Speaks, he writes, "True intelligence operates silently. Stillness is where creativity and solutions are found."

What inspires you? Who are you inspired by? What do you do to become and stay inspired? I would love to hear your thoughts on inspiration, and I hope you stay in touch with the stillness within you, because that's the way you will ultimately reconnect with yourself.

Obituary

Advocate for disabled led way for others

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Mona Winberg, who was born with cerebral palsy, will be remembered as one of the first people with a disability to become a spokesperson for the disabled.

Winberg, 76, died late last month after a two-week battle with pneumonia.

In a eulogy, nephew Sidney Troister said that when Winberg was born, her mother, Sarah, was told that her daughter would never walk or talk, and that she should be institutionalized.

"Way ahead of her time, Mona's mother refused to [listen] to the doctor's opinion. [Mona] was loved and cared for at home by her parents, and treated as much as possible like any other kid."

Troister said that although she had severely limited speech, mobility and hearing, Winberg went to school, wrote in a newsletter for the Ontario Federation for Cerebral Palsy, and went on to become the first person with a disability to be elected president of the federation.

Although it was difficult for her to be understood, he said, Winberg lobbied for Wheel Trans and accessibility, and she spoke to architects about accommodating people with disabilities.

In 1986, Winberg approached the Toronto Sun about writing a column that addressed the needs of disabled people, and for 10 years, wrote Disabled Today for the Sunday Sun.

"With her lack of control over her hands, it took Mona two full days just to type one of the columns," Troister said.

In her first column, he said, Mona wrote that "disabled people are neither larger-than-life heroes, nor pathetic objects of pity. We possess strengths and weaknesses, hopes and fears, capabilities and limitations, just like everyone else."

Troister said that in recognition of her work, Winberg received the King Clancy Award and the Fred Gardiner Award, and was inducted into the Terry Fox Hall of Fame. In 2002, she was awarded the Order of Canada by then-governor general Adrienne Clarkson in Ottawa.

"Throughout her adult life, Mona was a inspiration to her family and to the disabled throughout the country. With strong opinions, a sharp wit, courage, strength of character and an uncanny ability to charm decision-makers of all political stripes, she became a leader and a role model for people with disabilities," Troister said.

"She made a vital contribution to this country and to the place of disabled people in it. Her contribution is even more significant because she accomplished tasks that would have discouraged even a non-disabled person."

She also impressed others, including Patrick Boyer, who met Winberg when he was a member of Parliament in the 1980s and was crusading for equality rights for people with disabilities.

"Mona was simultaneously giving voice to the voiceless through her column. I think we inspired one another about what was possible," he said in an interview.

"When I met Mona, it was love at first sight. Here was a woman of solitary courage, of intelligence and humour, and of unrelenting advocacy. She sought a better deal for the more than one million Canadians who live with varying degrees of mental and physical disability," Boyer said.

After Winberg stopped writing her column, he said, he collaborated with her on a book due out in June, published by Blue Butterfly Books, called Solitary Courage: Mona Winberg and the Triumph over Disability.

"Mona's time on earth made a real difference in the lives of countless thousands, and Solitary Courage will help keep alive the example of her stellar leadership for others to now follow."

Winberg is survived by her sister-in-law Norma, her nieces and nephews, great-nieces and nephews, and a great-great-niece.

Venezuelan synagogue attack cause of concern

By MARCY OSTER
JTA

CARACAS — International Jewish groups expressed concern after an attack on a Caracas synagogue and blamed Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez for creating an atmosphere of hate in his country.

Up to 15 people attacked the Tiferet Israel Sephardi synagogue late last Friday night, throwing Torah scrolls on the floor and damaging some, according to reports. They also painted epithets such as "death to the Jews" on the synagogue's walls.

The synagogue's guard was held at gunpoint and was found on the floor of the building by members on Saturday morning, the Jerusalem Post reported.

It's not the first such attack on Jewish institutions in the country, which broke off diplomatic relations with Israel over the Gaza military operation, the New York Times reported. In response, Israel expelled the Venezuelan envoy and his embassy staff last week.

"The response of the State of Israel is weak, late and in any case for us it's an honor," Venezuelan Foreign Minister Nicolas Maduro told the Al-Jazeera news network about the expulsion. "We're proud that the State of Israel that exists today, led by these criminals, made this decision."

Hugo Chavez

The same shul was vandalized early last month. The Israeli embassy was also vandalized. A Jewish community centre was raided in 2007 in a search for illegal weapons. None were found.

Chavez's government decried the attack, the Times reported.

Chavez and local media had been increasingly critical of Israel during the previous week.

"The total disrespect of a Jewish house of worship reflects the escalating climate of hostility towards Jews in Venezuela," said David Harris, executive director of the American Jewish Committee.

Harris added: "There are strong indications that what we are witnessing is a state-sponsored campaign of anti-Semitic persecution, spurred by both Venezuela's alliance with the Iranian regime and the surge of anti-Israel rhetoric during the recent conflict between Israel and Hamas."

Harris called on the international community to declare its solidarity with Venezuela's Jewish community.

The Simon Wiesenthal Center also blamed Chavez's demonization of Israel and the Jewish community as the catalyst for the shul attack and called on world leaders to denounce it.

"This was no mere hate crime from the margins of society, but a reflection of President Chavez's campaign to demonize Israel and her supporters," said rabbis Marvin Hier, the centre's founder and dean, and Abraham Cooper, its associate dean, in a statement. "It is frightening to watch the inevitable consequences of Iran's chief ally in the Americas promotion of hatred of the Jewish people escalate into an attack, more reminiscent of Nazi Germany in 1938, than a democracy in 2009. The fact that the members of this synagogue stayed away from services this Friday night out of fear that the anti-Israel campaign had generated says it all."

B'nai Brith International has asked the U.S. State Department to investigate the attack.

"This has got to stop," said B'nai Brith executive vice-president Daniel Mariaschin. "It is unacceptable for a government to incite hatred. Chavez has cultivated an environment where his followers feel comfortable threatening Jews."

Abraham Foxman, national director of the Anti-Defamation League, urged Chavez to protect his country's Jewish community. "Sadly, this is not a random event in Venezuela. It is directly related to the atmosphere of anti-Jewish intimidation promoted by President Chavez and his government apparatus," Foxman said.

Chavez, Foxman said, "must ensure that his government quickly brings the perpetrators to justice."

Turkey shul set ablaze

By YOAV STERN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspapers Ltd.

Vandals set a synagogue in northwest Turkey ablaze on Sunday, sources within the Turkish Jewish community have reported.

No one was apparently wounded in the attack, which took place in the city of Bursa. The extent of property damage has yet to be fully assessed.

The incident came amid a rift between Israel and Turkey that was sparked by fierce Turkish censure of Israel's offensive against Hamas in Gaza.

The synagogue is not currently in use for daily prayer, since it was shut after the city's Jewish community shrank over the past few decades.

Sunday's attack was the first such incident to take place in Turkey following Israel's campaign in Gaza, which ended about three weeks ago.

The operation triggered a spate of anti-Semitic attacks across the world, most recently the vandalizing of a synagogue in Venezuela's capital, Caracas, late on Friday night.

Outgoing Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, meanwhile, on Sunday warned the cabinet against deepening the schism with Turkey, a key ally of Israel.

"[I'm] very concerned by the behaviour in public on the subject of Turkey," Olmert said. "Our relations with Turkey are important, and I recommend that we don't intensify our statements on the subject."

But Olmert added, despite his warning, that Turkey was "not exempt from domestic considerations… being a Muslim state on the eve of elections."

RABBI POSITION AVAILABLE

Congregation Agudath Achim, founded in 1904, an unaffiliated, traditional congregation in Little Rock, Arkansas, seeks a dynamic Rabbi. We are a congregation of 80 families, with mixed seating in our sanctuary. The Rabbi we seek must be able to attract members based on teaching quality, spiritual leadership and community interaction. We need a Rabbi who can invigorate and lead the congregation in its second century. Our Rabbi must be able and willing to conduct all Shabbat and holiday services, including the reading of the Torah, and have demonstrated ritual skills in all life-cycle events. A smicha from a recognized rabbinic institution is required. A combined salary and benefit package between $80,000 and $100,000 (USD) is available, based on experience.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However, they should not be too small nor too large. Please paint or draw bright, bold, colourful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. Please send us your name, address, phone number, age and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, Toronto, Ont., M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 3 p.m. on Tuesday, Feb. 17, 2009. We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen as the "winners." The judges will base their decisions on a number of factors such as: the use of colour, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The chances of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, February 20, 2009.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of March 5, 2009. Have fun and good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

Canadians play key roles at WJC plenary

By RON CSILLAG
Special to The CJN

JERUSALEM — Delegates to the 13th plenary of the World Jewish Congress held here last week left with a renewed solidarity with Israel in the wake of the country's military operation in Gaza.

More than 400 delegates from 90 countries, including 20 from Canada, came together for the two-day gathering to hear Israeli politicians reaffirm their nation's commitment to destroying terrorist infrastructure in Gaza, but also to listen to some delegates' heart-rending tales of anti-Semitism that the Gaza fighting triggered in their countries.

Iran was also front and centre, as experts issued dire warnings about the country's imminent nuclear capabilities.

U.S. cosmetics heir Ronald Lauder was reinstated as the New York-based WJC's president, while Moshe Ronen of Canada was reacclaimed as a vice-president.

Canadians played prominent roles at the meeting. In one instance, as a resolution proclaiming the Diaspora's solidarity with Israel was about to be passed, with a section singling out the United States and Australia for their special support during the Gaza incursion, Canadian Jewish Congress co-president Rabbi Reuven Bulka quickly rose to note Canada's "steadfast" support, too, adding that Canada's was the lone voice opposing a recent one-sided United Nations resolution on the fighting. Canada was added to the WJC resolution without debate.

In his remarks, Israeli President Shimon Peres said he sought to correct "misunderstandings and misrepresentations" about the Gaza conflict.

Since 2000, there have been 5,792 Qassam rockets and 4,411 mortars fired from Gaza into Israel, most of those since Israel quit the territory two years ago. The 20,000 or so overall terrorist attacks coming from Gaza resulted in 842 civilians and 325 Israeli troops killed in recent years.

"I don't know any country that went through such an experience," Peres said.

"So where is the disproportion?"

Contrary to charges that Israel laid siege to Gaza, Peres said that from June 2007 onward, Israel allowed 42,327 trucks carrying 1.8 million tonnes of fuel and supplies into Gaza. "The whole story of a siege is totally unfounded. There was never a shortage of fuel… [or] food."

Peres referred to a stockpile, found in 2005, of weapons smuggled into Gaza: 300,000 kilos of dynamite, 20,000 rockets, rifles, machine guns and pistols, and a half-million kilograms of ammunition.

"When you fight terrorism, you can't have a victory characteristic of conventional war because there is no uniform, no front, no army. The only way we have to stop terrorism is to hit terrorists hard."

He called Hamas "the greatest Arab problem."

Asked whether he thinks the terror group will continue attacking Israel, Peres said: "They won't do it so quickly. I hope the lesson will serve as a deterrent." (Two days later, Israeli aircraft struck at tunnels used for smuggling goods and weapons on the border between Gaza and Egypt).

In a short address, Likud leader and prime ministerial front-runner Benjamin Netanyahu said he has "no doubt that ultimately, militant Islam will lose the battle against modernity and freedom. The question is, at what price?"

He called for a broad alliance with Christians and moderate Muslims against anti-Semitism and "the creed of hate."

In his address, Lauder blasted the world's "double standard" in criticizing Israel's Gaza operation.

"How long would your governments wait if you were threatened, not just by words that promised your destruction, but by real rockets?" he asked. "When I look at the double standards the world applied to Jews, I come to the sad conclusion that with anti-Semitism, the best we can hope for is that it goes away for a time."

The anti-Semitism facing European Jews "is as bad as it's ever been," but "we will defend ourselves. We will not waver," he said.

Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak, who was well received, called the blow against Gaza the "toughest" ever carried out by the Jewish state. He said 150 tunnels used for arms smuggling were destroyed, along with 250 buildings used by extremists and more than 100 rocket launch pads.

Barak, a former prime minister, said he "strongly believes no other country would have had such patience for so long" as Israel did. "We are not trigger-happy or looking for wars," he added. "I have been through too many to be looking for wars."

Several delegates spoke of increased anti-Semitism in their countries. The envoy from Turkey related that hundreds of thousands of people in Istanbul attended an anti-Israel rally.

Rabbi Henry Sobel of Congregation Sao Paulo Israelite in Brazil was forthright. He called Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez, who ejected Israel's ambassador from his country, an anti-Semite, and he noted a worrying trend of anti-Semitism across South America.

Probably the best-received speaker was foreign minister Tzipi Livni, the Kadima party's candidate for prime minister in the Feb. 10 election. In a short, direct address, Livni, to wide applause, said that Israel is "not going to show restraint anymore."

An agreement with Hamas "is not an option. We need to change the rules of the game until they learn that the rules have changed and the equation has changed," she added.

"We are not trying to avoid negotiations. We are trying to do it the right way."

Canadians voted en bloc against two controversial resolutions, which both passed. One dealt with the recent decision by Pope Benedict to reverse the excommunication of a British bishop who openly denies the Holocaust. It called on the pontiff to "strengthen and reinforce the achievements of Jewish-Catholic dialogue thereby assisting to counter the adverse impression arising from the decision concerning Bishop [Richard] Williamson."

Rabbi Bulka said the resolution missed the point. "To welcome back a Holocaust denier flies in the face of elementary decency and is a travesty," he told The CJN. "The Pope has to make a clear statement addressing and redressing the damage that this decision has caused."

The other resolution dealt with the followup to the UN's 2001 anti-racism conference, known as Durban II, slated for later this year. Moments after Livni encouraged countries to boycott Durban II, the measure called on Jewish communities around the world to pressure their governments to ensure that the conference is not a replay of the 2001 parley, which descended into a chorus of anti-Israel sentiment. Failing that, the resolution encouraged governments to stay away from the conference.

Rabbi Bulka said the Canadian delegation was "firmly behind the government of Canada," which announced a year ago that it would not attend Durban II. "They saw long before now where this sham is going. They have been proven correct."

"To suggest that one can minimize the racism and hate that will be present at the conference is like saying that instead of much poison, we can settle for a little less poison."

Papal decision concerns Canadian Jewish Congress

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Canadian Jewish Congress is among Jewish groups worldwide expressing concern that Pope Benedict's decision to lift an excommunication order against a bishop who doubts the accuracy of facts about the Holocaust could negatively affect Catholic-Jewish relations.

In a statement last week, Congress called on local Catholic leaders to speak out against the decision.

Late last month, the Pope revoked an excommunication order against four bishops who were part of a Catholic faction that rejects the Second Vatican Council of the 1960s, which introduced reforms to improve relations with Jews.

The Pope's move is seen as an attempt to bring the bishops back into the Catholic fold, as long as they accept the authority of Church teachings.

Rabbi Reuven Bulka

Among the four is Bishop Richard Williamson, who has said he doubts the accuracy of the accepted history of the Holocaust.

"I believe that the historical evidence is hugely against six million Jews having been deliberately gassed in gas chambers as a deliberate policy of Adolf Hitler," Bishop Williamson said in an interview with Swedish television that aired just days before the papal ruling and the International Day of Remembrance of the Holocaust on Jan. 27.

"I believe there were no gas chambers," Bishop Williamson added.

"I think that 200- to 300,000 Jews perished in Nazi concentration camps… but none of them by gas chambers."

Canadian Jewish Congress urged the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops (CCCB) to condemn the Pope's decision to lift the excommunication.

"We call on the leadership of the Catholic Church in Canada to follow the lead of bishops in France, Belgium and Germany, among other countries, in denouncing the Holocaust denial and anti-Semitism of Bishop Williamson and in reaffirming in no uncertain terms that such hateful views have no place in the Church," CJC co-president Rabbi Reuven Bulka said.

"Indeed, we call upon all Catholics in Canada, on the pulpit and from the pew, to join in this denunciation."

Other Jewish groups, including the Anti-Defamation League and B'nai Brith International, have also criticized Bishop Williamson for his comments about the Holocaust.

As well, the Pope's move prompted the Israeli Chief Rabbinate to break its ties with the Vatican and suspend an annual interfaith meeting with Catholic leaders, scheduled for next month in Jerusalem.

In response to calls from the Jewish community, the CCCB released a statement that said it "finds abhorrent the notion that somehow the terrible evil of the Holocaust is not a fact of history and joins the Holy Father Pope Benedict XVI in calling on all people to recognize that the Holocaust is 'an admonition against oblivion, negation and reductionism.'"

The CCCB said it rejects Bishop Williamson's comments and added that he "has been forbidden to speak further on this question."

The CCCB said it remains "committed to dialogue with the Jews."

Speaking with The CJN, CCCB president James Weisgerber, the Archbishop of Winnipeg, said the Pope's decision on Bishop Williamson was made so that the Pope would be in a better position to preside over him.

"If he is outside the Church, there is nothing we can do about it, but when he is in the Church, then he has to deal with this stuff," Archbishop Weisgerber said.

But, he added, everyone was shocked by Bishop Williamson's statements.

"It is very clear that this view is not only unaccepted, but it is completely idiotic."

Following CJC's call to the CCCB to respond, Rabbi Bulka met with Papal Nuncio Luigi Ventura, the Vatican's ambassador to Canada, to convey the concerns of the Jewish community.

CJC spokesperson Jordan Kerbel said Ventura made a commitment that he would visit with the Pope and express the concerns of the Canadian Jewish community.

"We explicitly asked the nuncio to convey to the Vatican that [Bishop] Williamson must publicly renounce his odious views before being granted full communion and welcomed back into the Church," Rabbi Bulka said in a statement.

Schalit alive, Sarkozy says

After speaking with French President Nicolas Sarkozy the father of captured Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit said he has hope for the release of his son from Gaza. Noam Schalit made the remarks Jan. 27 after being summoned to see Sarkozy. Schalit told reporters in Paris that Sarkozy assured him his son is alive and that France is "using every means available" to free him. The soldier has dual French-Israeli citizenship.

Israel strikes back in Gaza

The Israeli Air Force targeted a Gaza man in response to the launching of a Qassam rocket into Sderot. It was the second rocket attack on Israel and the second retaliatory attack in less than 24 hours. Israel's Jan. 29 air strike targeted Machmad Uda Chamdan Samiri, 25, a known terror operative of the Global Jihad, the Israel Defence Forces said. Samiri was wounded in the strike. Following a rocket attack on southern Israel on Jan. 28, Israel launched a successful aerial attack against a weapons-making facility in Rafah, the IDF said.

U.S focus narrows

The Obama administration's focus on Israeli-Arab peace is solely on the Palestinian track for now, Hillary Rodham Clinton said in her first news briefing as U.S. secretary of state. She was asked Jan. 27 about her earlier pledges to advance Israel-Syria talks. She said the focus now is appropriately on the new special envoy to the Israel-Palestinian talks, George Mitchell, and his visit last week to the region.

Torontonian aids Yad Vashem expansion project

By MARK ELLIOTT SHAPIRO
Israel Correspondent

JERUSALEM — Another milestone has been passed on the road to continued education about – and greater understanding of – the Holocaust, and a member of Toronto's Jewish community is part of that story.

Joseph Gottdenker, a philanthropist and Holocaust survivor who serves on the boards of several Jewish non-profits, is a Yad Vashem benefactor who recently donated seed money to build a new international seminars wing at Yad Vashem's International School for Holocaust Studies.

Yad Vashem, the Holocaust Martyrs' and Heroes' Remembrance Authority, is located on Har Hazikaron, the Mount of Remembrance, adjacent to Mount Herzl.

A ceremony was held there Jan. 19 to lay the cornerstone for the new wing. Some 60 educators from nearly 20 countries attended the event, as did 26 ambassadors.

During the Holocaust, a Polish police officer, Wladyslaw Ziolo, provided asylum to Gottdenker and his mother, Bina. When it became too dangerous for Bina to remain, Ziolo provided her with false identity papers, helping her to escape with the Polish underground.

The Ziolo family protected Joe, raising him as their own child for almost three years. After the war, Joe, with the help of his uncle, David Zuckerbrot, was reunited with his parents in Germany.

The Gottdenkers spent three years in Germany as displaced persons before immigrating to the United States in 1948. Ten years later, they moved to Canada. Joe attended high school in Toronto and university in London, Ont.

"I was born into a world where whole Jewish communities, built up over centuries, were destroyed mercilessly without a second thought," he told attendees in his address, which stressed the importance of Holocaust education.

"We must ensure the tragedies of the past do not repeat themselves in the lives of our children and grandchildren. We must ensure the memory of every person who perished in the Holocaust is preserved, and that their stories are told, so that the lessons of the Holocaust will resound the world over," he said.

"Yad Vashem recognizes this responsibility and stands at the forefront of Holocaust commemoration and education."

He added that "Yad Vashem is without a doubt the most influential and active institution in safeguarding the memory of the Holocaust."

"As a Holocaust survivor, I know only too well the human capacity for evil. I believe the only way to rise above this evil is through education. It is not enough for us to remember the Holocaust in our hearts. To truly honour the memory of those who perished, we must ensure that they and the Shoah are remembered in the hearts of the third generation and the fourth generation and every generation to come."

One of the educators taking part in Yad Vashem's winter seminar program, Canadian Steven Van Zoost, an English teacher at Avon View High School in Windsor, N.S., also spoke at the ceremony.

Van Zoost said that he "had three reasons for attending the winter seminar.

"First, I wanted to learn about how to teach the Holocaust other than as a series of dates and consequences for Jewish people… Secondly, I wanted to learn about modern Israel, and this seminar has helped me through lectures, but also through experiences outside of our classes… Finally, my third reason for attending this seminar was that I wanted to promote Holocaust education within my profession, something that I will continue to do through professional publications and my university teaching with other teachers."

Godfrey returns to the media after stint with Jays

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Paul Godfrey, the new president and chief executive officer of the Toronto-based National Post, was in a joking mood when a reporter walked into his office early one afternoon last month.

"I'm still looking for the washrooms and where the bodies are buried," he quipped, grinning.

Striking a more serious tone, he expressed confidence that he can fulfil his mandate and put the National Post – founded by Conrad Black in 1998 – on the road to profitability.

"I hope my appointment will dispel rumours that the Post is closing. I wouldn't have taken this job if I thought so. People feed on gossip. We know that."

Godfrey, who turned 70 on the cold, snowy day he was interviewed, was hired to achieve that objective by Leonard Asper, the president of Canwest Global Communications Corp., Canada's largest media empire.

He arrived at the Post from the Toronto Blue Jays baseball club, where he had been president and CEO for the past eight years. "I had indicated to him [Asper] that I was leaving the Blue Jays and did want to retire. He asked, 'Would you like to run the Post?'"

Godfrey was gung-ho. "I'd always had a love for newspapers," he said.

No one in the business was really surprised by Asper's decision to tap Godfrey. Prior to his stint with the Jays, Godfrey was publisher of the Toronto Sun and chief executive of Sun Media Corp. At Sun Media Corp., one of his tasks was to make the Financial Post profitable. Within three years, he had achieved his goal.

And now, at the National Post, he is determined to repeat his success.

"I've honestly felt that the Post is an important voice in Canada. I want to ensure that its longevity is preserved, that its revenue base – advertising and circulation – is strong and that the editorial product is accurate, fair and opinionated."

Godfrey, however, has no illusions.

"The Post is not in the black right now, but the situation is not as critical as many people have painted it to be," said Godfrey, whose office faces the newsroom. "The Post is much better off than most people think. It's nowhere near where people think it is. With some fine-tuning and effort, the Post will be around for decades. We're a solid read. We have the talent and determination to succeed. To use a baseball analogy, we can hit a home run."

He added, "The Post can make a contribution to Canwest in a short period of time."

Although he was not given a contract when he signed on, he is hardly worried. "I'm way beyond retirement age," said Godfrey, who's in fine form and works out several times a week.

"I'll do it as long as we're both happy. I've always enjoyed everything I've done," said Godfrey, who recently returned from a lengthy vacation at his Florida condo. "I've always had fun jobs."

The son of Philip, a scrap dealer, and Bess, a political campaign manager, he was born in Toronto and raised in the Kensington Market neighbourhood.

A graduate of Bathurst Heights Secondary School and the University of Toronto (chemical engineering), he launched his career in industry. Then, thanks to his mother's influence, he segued into local politics as a North York alderman.

In 1973, he was appointed chair of Metropolitan Toronto, a position he held until 1984. In this capacity, he was instrumental in bringing the Blue Jays to Toronto. "I had always been a sports fan," he said.

Taking credit for having helped transform Toronto into what he described as "North America's safest and most livable city," Godfrey groused that the city has since fallen on harder times. "The halo has slipped. It bothers me to see new and higher taxes and less services. It's not the city it once was. It's time for younger people to step forward."

As he remembers, he was "totally dumbfounded" when Doug Creighton, one of the founders of the Toronto Sun, asked him to be its new publisher. "He wanted me because I was high-profile and could bring respectability and people skills to the Sun," he explained.

"Certain parts of the job – advertising and circulation – were easy," Godfrey recalled. "But convincing the editorial people that a former politician was their boss was harder. I had to convince them that I didn't want to spin the news, and that took two to three years."

When Godfrey reported for duty in 1984, the Sun was widely considered brash and outspoken. "It was viewed as a racy newspaper," he said, referring to its photographs of scantily-clad Sunshine Girls.

Never one to ignore demographics, Godfrey did not throw out that popular feature, but he did upgrade the quality of the Sun by hiring what he calls respectable journalists and columnists.

"The Sun gained a major degree of respectability in the community. We broke news stories, and we were second to none in sports coverage. We changed the approach rather than the culture of the Sun."

Leaving the Sun, Godfrey reinvented himself as the Blue Jays' chief executive officer. Ted Rogers, the communications mogul, recruited him in 2000, the year he bought the team. With Godfrey at the helm, the payroll was increased and the SkyDome was purchased, but the Blue Jays never finished better than second place in the American League.

Reflecting on the team's singular inability to rise to the very top, he mused, "Sure I was disappointed. Every team thinks it can win, but in reality it's hard to win unless you spend a lot more money than you can make."

Still, Godfrey was an avid fan, attending every home game and a quarter of the out-of-town contests and watching the rest on television.

"My wife didn't sue me for divorce," he chuckled.

Now, at the Post, Godfrey has dispensed with the scruffy beard he wore for about seven years. "It was time for a new look, which is similar to the old look," he said.

Saying that journalism has changed dramatically since his days at the Sun, Godfrey talked about the emergence of the Internet and digital newspapers.

Although he fears that the Internet will gradually erode newspaper circulation, he believes that ink-on-paper dailies will survive.

"Most people love the portability and comfort of a hands-on newspaper. People have been predicting the demise of the newspaper since the advent of radio and TV. But newspapers are basically content providers and will survive."

As president of the Post, he revels in the knowledge that he can have an impact on the local, provincial and national level.

But Godfrey, a Conservative party loyalist, has no intention of returning to politics in the future.

"I don't think so," said Godfrey, the father of three grown sons. "I have no desire to go back to it, though I've been encouraged to run provincially and federally. I was always content with my life in Toronto."

Godfrey – who sits on the boards of Baycrest and Mount Sinai Hospital, and whose wife Gina is associated with the Jerusalem Foundation – still hopes to bring a National Football League franchise to Toronto.

"Toronto is one of the missing components of the NFL," said Godfrey, who is certain that both an NFL and a Canadian Football League team can coexist here. "Toronto is a great sports city."

TJFF serves up tea and two very different films

Bernie Reubens (Gregg Sulkin) with his mother Esther played by Helena Bonham Carter.

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

The Toronto Jewish Film Festival wraps up its Chai Tea & a Movie program with two more movies in the next few weeks, one in Toronto and the other in its new Richmond Hill location.

Set in England in 1966, Sixty Six, starring Helena Bonham Carter, is an enjoyable movie for the whole family.

Bernie Reubens hates everything about his life. His father eats dinner in his underwear and refuses to drive over 25 miles an hour. Bernie's older brother bullies him both at school and at home. One day at the beach, his parents forget all about him and leave him behind.

The only thing he is looking forward to is starting a new life as a man on his bar mitzvah day, nine months away.

The way he sees it, his bar mitzvah is going to be huge – "the Jesus Christ of bar mitzvahs." It's going to be a legend. It will be held at the best hotel, there will be 350 present-bearing guests, and even crooner Frankie Vaughan will be there. More importantly, he himself will be the centre of attention.

But there are a few snags along the way. His dad's grocery store is losing customers to the big supermarket that just opened up the street. Money is tight and they just can't afford the lavish event Bernie's older brother got.

And to make it worse, his bar mitzvah is planned for July 30. This is the day of the World Cup final, which England is hosting that year. If England, always an underdog, makes it to the final, no one will come to his bar mitzvah.

Bernie's only hope is that England doesn't make it past the first round. "Don't worry," his blind rabbi tells him. "England never gets to the final."

Bernie takes to chanting voodoo curses at the English team, and sending letters to the team's manager threatening him if he picks certain good players. At synagogue, he prays to God for the English players to get a bout of diarrhea during the games.

Does England make the final? If you don't know, I won't tell you, except to say English soccer fans today still talk about 1966 the way Toronto Maple Leaf fans talk about 1967.

Sixty Six is a fun, light-hearted coming-of-age film. It is being screened on Feb. 15 at the Sheppard Grande Theatre, 4861 Yonge St.

* * *

Two Ladies (Dans La Vie) is a French movie about tolerance. It was screened at the Toronto International Film Festival in 2007.

The film is set in a city in the south of France during the Second Lebanon War. Esther, an elderly Jewish lady, is confined to a wheelchair. Her son, a neurologist, hires Selima, a young, well-assimilated Muslim woman, to be her nurse. Esther, he tells her, is temperamental and might be hard to deal with. In fact, shortly afterward, she fires her housekeeper/companion for being too boring for her.

In a bind, the son accepts Selima's offer to have her mother, Halima, take care of Esther during the day.

Halima appears to be prejudiced and anti-Israeli. Watching the news of the Lebanon war that is taking place, she flips the bird at the Israeli troops on her screen. But she accepts Selima's job offer. She needs the money to be able to make the pilgrimage to Mecca once before she dies, as is every Muslim's duty.

Seems like a recipe for disaster: a bitter, angry Jewish woman and an anti-Israeli Muslim woman.

But, as this sentimental movie shows, rivals can get along. The two ladies find out they're both originally from Algeria and have much in common. Soon, they become best friends.

But it's not easy for Halima. She becomes the shame of her neighbourhood. Her neighbours criticize her and complain that she is going to Mecca with Jewish sin money.Even her other children want her to give up the job. In despair, she asks her imam for help. He tells her that on the contrary, even Mohammed made deals with Jews.

Two Ladies is a warm-hearted movie about tolerance and open-mindedness. It screens at the Silver City in Richmond Hill, 8725 Yonge St. on March 1.

For both movies, tea is at 1 p.m., movie at 2 p.m. Tickets are $15 each. For Sixty Six only, one ticket also allows admission for two children under 12. Tickets can be bought at the door or by calling 416-967-1528.

Artist Iris Häussler addresses the crowd at the opening of her exhibit at Honest Ed's called Honest Threads.

Art installation allows you to walk in Ed Mirvish's shoes

By SHERRY SMITHER
Special to The CJN

Tucked away in a small red gallery on the second floor of the Honest Ed's store is Iris Häussler's art installation, Honest Threads. The exhibit of clothing, framed photos and a description of the memories they carry drew a crowd of 350 people to the recent opening.

Presented by Koffler Centre of the Arts, the installation includes 105 framed photos of people wearing cherished garments, with personal stories underneath, as well as a display of those garments and others, all lent by Torontonians. Visitors can even take some of the clothes home to wear for a few days and thus share in the experience.

Honest Threads seems at home in Toronto's landmark Honest Ed's – after all, with its charming collection of celebrity photos and memorabilia, the store is more than a bargain hunter's paradise.

Häussler is known for installing work in unique locations. In 2006, she chose a downtown Toronto house for her project The Legacy of Joseph Wagenbach, based on a fictional artist who filled his home with sculptures.

While she continues to create characters and environments that reveal past histories, both fictional and real, she's also interested in what makes people individuals.

"The roots of Honest Threads lie in what shapes our identity. Clothing is a small part of that," Häussler told The CJN before the opening reception. "I originally developed this project 14 years ago in Germany on the Polish-German border, but it did not spark because it needed maintenance and care – it's built on trust of the people who share something when they generously lend a garment to someone who can care for it for a little while."

This time, Häussler's project received the necessary maintenance and care from the Koffler Centre. Honest Threads marks the Koffler Gallery's first off-site exhibition prior to its June closing while the new 40,000-square-foot Koffler Centre of the Arts is built – it's scheduled to be completed in 2011.

There to celebrate the exhibition's opening were Honest Ed's David and Audrey Mirvish, Koffler Centre chair of the board Tiana Koffler Boyman and executive director Lori Starr, and Art Gallery of Ontario CEO Matthew Teitelbaum.

Clothing on exhibit includes Ed Mirvish's patent leather shoes, and a hat and suede jacket belonging to Matthew Teitelbaum's late father, Mashel Teitelbaum, a Toronto artist for more than 30 years. In the accompanying photo, Mashel is seen wearing the hat in 1960, on the deck of a boat with his daughter, Mara, who submitted the clothing.

Lori Starr lent a beaded jacket she received from a 90-year-old friend when Starr moved from Los Angeles.

Another participant, Elizabeth Peereboom, lent Häussler her grandmother's blue dress given to Peereboom and her mother on a visit to the Soviet Union in the 1980s. The visit came 44 years after the Nazis forced Peereboom's mother, then a teenager, to leave home to work in Germany.

Peereboom writes, "Although the dress can't talk, we need to keep the stories alive of the people who precede us for those who come after."

What does Häussler plan to do with the framed pieces? "Till now, I have kept it a secret, but I will give each participant the framed picture back with their story. I'm not interested in harvesting these stories, I just set the frame for people to tell their stories."

Honest Threads runs until March 8. Admission is free at Honest Ed's, 581 Bloor St. W., 2nd floor, east wing. Closed Saturdays, statutory and Jewish holidays. For hours and more information, go to www.kofflerarts.org or call 416-636-1880, ext. 228.

CBC DOCUMENTARY TELLS STORY OF INTERRUPTED LOVE

An upcoming CBC feature documentary, Love Interrupted, tells the story of two couples, including Alfred and Isabel Bader, who were torn apart by race, class and religion.

Alfred was sent to Canada in the first kindertransport from Vienna. He completed high school in Quebec, studied at Queen's University, and became a businessman, art dealer and philanthropist. He fell in love with Isabel in 1949 but broke up with her in 1950 because she did not feel she could convert to Judaism.

He married another woman (who converted to Judaism) and they had two sons, but he broke up his marriage after 30 years to return to Isabel. (The other couple in the documentary were kept apart because he was an Italian Catholic waiter and she was an English doctor's daughter.)

The theme of Love Interrupted is love and reconnection. It airs as a Valentine's Day special on Feb. 12, 9 p.m.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Duo follows the yellow brick road to charity

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

People with multiple passions often lament they don't have enough time to pursue all of them.

But for Eric Weisz and Jason Spetter, the limits of the 24-hour clock don't seem to matter. Indeed, these luminaries always make time for their passions, especially since doing so benefits so many others.

By day, they are immersed in the demanding corporate world. Weisz toils as managing director of The Effort Trust Company, while Spetter is a lawyer at Lipman, Zener & Wazman LLP.

By night, they are co-founders of Fallen Rock Productions, which develops musical theatre productions to benefit charities.

"It's amazing what you can do when you're motivated," says Spetter, 36. "We both love our jobs and we are also passionate about the theatre and giving back, so we find the time to do it all."

Since 2003, Fallen Rock has donated over $250,000 to various charitable causes through its theatrical productions, including Moulin Rouge, West Side Story, Little Shop of Horrors, Grease, Joseph and the Amazing Technicolor Dreamcoat, and Beauty and the Beast.

This year, executive producer Weisz, artistic director Spetter and their growing cast and crew will be presenting the Wizard of Oz from Feb. 18-22 at the Isabel Bader Theatre in Toronto.

"The Wizard of Oz is a timeless classic," says Weisz. "It's great for audiences of all ages."

The cast of Wizard of Oz in rehearsal. Proceeds go to a children's charity.

All proceeds will go towards the Pediatric Oncology Group of Ontario (POGO), which is dedicated to Ontario's children with cancer, working towards equal access to state-of-the-art diagnosis, treatment, care and optimal quality of life.

"POGO is a very compelling cause," says Weisz, 37. "We are extremely happy to be helping them out."

Although this is the seventh year Fallen Rock has put on its show, the company's history goes back to the mid-1980s, when Weisz and Spetter were campers at Wahanowin near Orillia, Ont.

"I was a really shy kid at camp, but they were casting for a camp production of A Chorus Line and the director really pushed me to play a particular role," recalls Spetter.

"When I delivered my lines, the laughter from the audience caught me right away. From that moment, I was in love with theatre."

Weisz also nurtured a love for the stage at camp and many years later, the two reconnected at Osgoode Hall Law School, where in true thespian fashion, they participated in a mock trial production.

After law school, they decided to parlay their theatrical talents into a production company that would perform solely to benefit good causes.

"I grew up in a family that was very philanthropic and that made me see how important it is to give back to the community," notes Weisz, who is also involved with the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, Mount Sinai Hospital and other causes.

Spetter was also brought up with a deep social consciousness and community focus.

"My grandmother, who passed away at the age of 98 in 2007, was a big inspiration to me," he says. "She never had much money, but always found a way to give back, no matter what. Even though she didn't have a car, she still volunteered with Meals on Wheels, taking a bus to do all the deliveries."

Spetter notes he is trying to set a similar example for his two daughters, aged two and four, about the importance of supporting and building community.

In addition to the delight of the audiences and POGO, Fallen Rock is serving another integral purpose as a breeding ground for up and coming actors.

"Emerging artists look to Fallen Rock in order to further their careers," says Weisz. "As we have grown and gained exposure, we provide these artists with a chance to perform and get noticed by casting directors and producers. And we have been a real springboard for them to do that."

Actors who have appeared in Fallen Rock performances have gone on to professional endeavours at Mirvish Productions, the Shaw Festival and Stratford.

Tickets for the Wizard of Oz are available at www.uofttix.ca or by calling 416-978-8849.

Berr's Holocaust diary is a jolting testament

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Helene Berr was born on March 27, 1921, in Paris and died on April 10, 1945, in Bergen-Belsen, only five days before the British army liberated this wretched concentration camp.

Hers was a life nipped in the bud by the forces of fanaticism and racism.

One of five children born to a prosperous, assimilated Jewish middle-class family, she was a student of English literature at the Sorbonne.

Whatever dreams and ambitions she had were shattered by Germany's occupation of France.

On April 7, 1942, she began to keep a diary. She stopped writing on Nov. 28, 1942, and resumed her entries on Aug. 25, 1943.

On March 7, 1944, a few months prior to France's liberation, she and her parents, Raymond and Antoinette, were arrested, deported to the Drancy transit camp and shipped to Auschwitz.

She survived, though her parents were murdered. But in November of that year, she was transferred to Bergen-Belsen, where she contracted typhus. Unable to get up from her bunk for reveille, she was brutally beaten to death.

Fortunately, Berr entrusted her diary – which has been compared to Anne Frank's – to a family employee, who in turn gave it to Berr's fiancé.

The English-language version, The Journal of Helene Berr (McClelland & Stewart) has now been published. A portrait of a sensitive woman and a dark era, it is a diary dripping with tragedy.

In one of her first entries, she complains about the abnormal situation Jews like herself face. "I am fed up with not being normal. I am fed up with no longer feeling as free as air."

A beautiful spring day, as well as a leisurely walk to a bookshop, alleviate her sorrow. But Berr is soon plunged into a state of despair, depressed by the news that Jews are obliged to wear the dreaded yellow star and that a friend's father has died in a concentration camp. As she writes: "The thought of that death haunted me and turned everything else into nothing."

Berr expresses indignation that Jews have been subjected to anti-Semitic restrictions. They are no longer entitled to cross the Champs-Elysees and frequent theatres and restaurants. "I boiled over with such rage that I had to... calm myself down," she notes.

Told that a new roundup of Jews is imminent, she writes, "A wave of terror has been gripping everybody... It appears that the SS have taken command in France and that terror must follow."

Berr reports that "factory girls" have requested permission to marry their Jewish boyfriends so they can stave off deportation. She also says that "people on the street" regard her with sympathy and compassion.

The deportations, however, do not cease: "Mme. Carpentier saw two goods trains at Drancy in which men and women had been stacked like cattle, without even any straw, for deportation."

At various times, she expresses deep frustration over her fate.

"Lefschetz gave a lecture about the Jewish Question which drove me to increasing exasperation. What he said about the Jewish nation, and this is true, was that we did not know why we were being persecuted because we had lost our traditions and had to return to the ghetto. No, I do not belong to the Jewish race."

Judaism, she maintains, is a religion, not a racial category.

Berr reprises that theme in a much later entry: "I do not feel different from other people. I will never think of myself as a member of a separate human group, and perhaps that is why I suffer so much, because I do not understand it at all. I suffer from the spectacle of human beastliness."

Rejecting Zionism, she compares it to "hideous fanatical Germanism," a comparison that readers will question. Berr's naievety also surfaces when she protests that 25 Jewish families have been arrested "without the slightest reason."

Likening her plight to a traveller lost in a desert, she says, "Nobody will ever know what this summer and autumn have been for me. Nobody will ever know, because I have carried on living... But not a single one of my deep thoughts ... hasn't been a source of pain. I've not suffered physically yet... But in my soul, in my affections and in a general sense, I have lived and am living in perpetual pain."

Helene Berr in 1942

Berr can't quite comprehend the scope and madness of Nazi policy. As she puts it, "we talked about Mme. Samuel. In the end, she was deported. She had been left behind because she was a half-Jew and a pregnant mother. But they deported her from the clinic in a hospital car; that cannot be true."

In a heart-rending entry, she wonders whether the world will ever be able to understand what it was like to live through "this appalling tempest when you are ready to grasp life's beauty."

At the Place de la Concorde, passing a group of Germans, she observes, "Without knowing what they are doing, those men have deprived... Europe of joie de vivre. They clashed so sharply with the fragile and luminous beauty of Paris: men capable of committing such horrors... men of a race that has spawned the Nazi leaders who have gone so far in self-abasement, despiritualization and stupidity as to become no more than brainless automata..."

Later, she adds, "Nowadays, and this is new, when I see a German man or woman, I notice, with amazement, that a wave of anger rises up inside me, I want to strike them. For me, they have become the people perpetrating the evil I come up against every minute."

In a similar vein, she muses, "There can be no security for Europe so long as German imperialism has not been uprooted."

Having noted that there are not many Jews left in Paris after all the roundups, Berr succumbs to pessimism. "We don't have much prospect of keeping out of the way, because we won't be tipped off," she writes.

Although she does not fear the future, she realizes she may be fooling herself. "I said I was not afraid. But I wonder whether that is only out of ignorance, from not knowing the suffering to be endured, not knowing how far my resistance will go."

Berr, in her bones, has internalized her fate. "I know that if we are taken I will be deported separately from my parents and that the separation will be atrociously painful for all of us, above and beyond the fact of being deported."

As she waits for the inevitable, she reports that the Jews of Bordeaux have been arrested.

And so it goes in The Journal of Helene Berr, yet one more jolting testament in the annals of the Holocaust.

Israel responds to rocket attacks

JTA

JERUSALEM — Israel's Air Force struck several targets in Gaza in response to new rocket barrages on southern Israel.

Earlier Sunday, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said Israel would launch a "disproportionate" response to the new rocket fire on the country's southern border.

The targets of Israel's retaliatory strike included six smuggling tunnels and a Hamas outpost, according to a statement from an Israel Defence Forces spokesperson.

"As the sole authority in the Gaza Strip, Hamas bears full responsibility for all terrorism originating within its area of control," the statement said.

Israel had sent telephone warnings to civilians in the area to vacate before the strikes, according to reports.

Two Israeli soldiers and one civilian were injured Sunday afternoon after five mortar shells were fired from Gaza at the western Negev. Later Sunday evening, a Qassam rocket was fired from Gaza into the western Negev.

At least four Qassam rockets were fired from Gaza into the western Negev shortly before 7 a.m. Sunday. One of the rockets landed between two kindergartens, according to reports. Four mortar shells were launched later in the morning but caused no damage.

Also Sunday morning, Palestinian gunmen fired on Israeli soldiers near the border fence close to the Kissufim crossing. The soldiers returned fire, and there were no injuries.

A long-range Grad rocket struck south of Ashkelon on Saturday morning. Residents were alerted with a Colour Red siren.

Olmert addressed the renewed violence, in violation of a Jan. 18 ceasefire declared by Hamas following a unilateral ceasefire declared by Israel, at the beginning of Sunday's regular cabinet meeting.

Olmert said "the cabinet's position from the outset was that if firing continues against residents of the south, there would be a sharp Israeli response that would be disproportional vis-a-vis the firing at residents of the State of Israel and at our forces. We will not go back to the rules of the game that the terrorist organizations tried to dictate in the past. We will act according to new rules that will ensure that we are not dragged into an unending shooting war on the southern border that denies southern residents a normal life."

The prime minister added, "I asked Defence Minister Ehud Barak to instruct the IDF, as his position requires, to prepare an Israeli response that is required by the circumstances that have been created as a result of this firing. Such an Israeli action and such an Israeli response will come at a time and place of our choosing. We will not warn the terrorist elements in advance as to how, where and when we will respond, but we will respond. This must be unequivocally clear."

Hamas agrees to one-year truce

JTA

JERUSALEM — Hamas has agreed to a year-long Gaza truce with Israel proposed by Egypt, an Arabic TV network reported.

The Dubai-based Al-Arabiya satellite network reported Sunday that Hamas representatives would give the ruling terrorist organization's final answer to the Egyptian initiative in Cairo on Monday.

According to the Al-Arabiya report, Hamas agreed to the deployment of Palestinian Authority (PA) troops at Gaza border crossings, who will co-ordinate with Hamas. The report said the truce would begin Thursday.

Israeli officials did not confirm the report, according to Israel Radio.

PA President Mahmoud Abbas cancelled a planned trip to the Czech Republic and was scheduled to leave Monday for Cairo.

Vancouver skater waiting for next shot with Islanders

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Trevor Smith is hoping, no, make that expecting, that the five-game audition he enjoyed with the New York Islanders will turn out to be more than the proverbial cup of coffee in the National Hockey League.

Trevor Smith

Smith, who toils in the American Hockey League with the Bridgeport Sound Tigers, was called up to the big club a few weeks ago for one home game and a four-game road trip. He believes he acquitted himself well, skating with the big boys, making plays and even popping in his first NHL goal in Calgary against Miikka Kiprusoff.

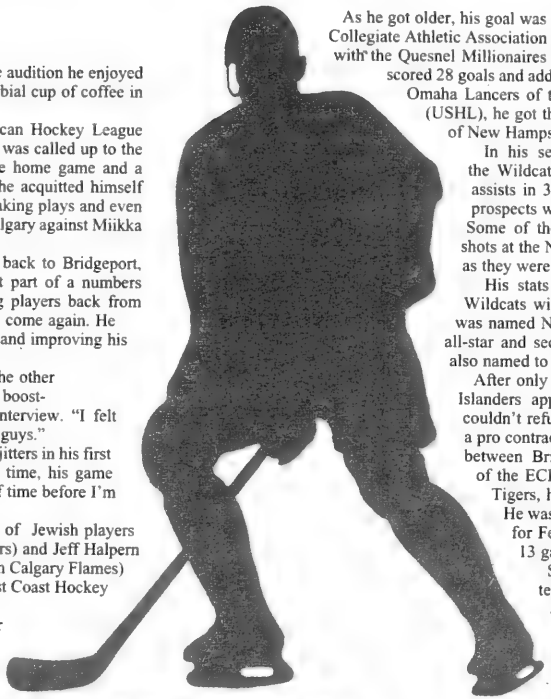
He was told before being sent back to Bridgeport, Conn., that his departure was just part of a numbers game – the Islanders were getting players back from injury – and that his chance would come again. He was advised to keep working hard and improving his game.

The Calgary game along with the other four were definitely "confidence boosters," Smith said in a telephone interview. "I felt speed-wise I could play with these guys."

Smith, 24, admits to early game jitters in his first NHL game but as he got more ice time, his game improved. "I feel it's just a matter of time before I'm back in the NHL," the six-foot-one, 195-pound left-winger said.

If he does make it back to Long Island, Smith will join a handful of Jewish players in the NHL. Apart from veterans Mathieu Schneider (Atlanta Thrashers) and Jeff Halpern (Tampa Bay Lightning), only Eric Nystrom and Mike Cammalleri (both Calgary Flames) round out the Jewish fraternity. You've got to look to the AHL and East Coast Hockey League (ECHL) to find the next batch of talented Jewish players.

Smith, who hails from North Vancouver, played most of his minor hockey on the West Coast. Coached by his dad, Harvey, he was pushed to improve more than the other players on his father's tyke and pee wee teams. It looks like it paid off, he said.



As he got older, his goal was to earn a scholarship to a National Collegiate Athletic Association (NCAA) Division I team. His play with the Quesnel Millionaires got him noticed. In 44 games, he scored 28 goals and added 19 assists. After a year with the Omaha Lancers of the United States Hockey League (USHL), he got the call to play with the University of New Hampshire Wildcats.

In his second of only two seasons with the Wildcats, Smith scored 21 goals and 22 assists in 39 games. He quickly realized his prospects were not limited to college hockey. Some of the guys around him were getting shots at the NHL, and he knew he was as good as they were.

His stats backed him up. He helped the Wildcats win their sixth regular season title, was named NCAA All Hockey East first-team all-star and second-team all-American. He was also named to the New England all-star team.

After only two years of college hockey, the Islanders approached him with an offer he couldn't refuse – leave college early and sign a pro contract. Smith split the 2007-08 season between Bridgeport and the Utah Grizzlies of the ECHL. In 53 games with the Sound Tigers, he tallied 20 goals and 17 assists. He was named AHL rookie of the month for February after scoring 15 points in 13 games.

So far this year, he's leading the team in goals with 22 and he's added 14 helpers in 41 games.

His play, coupled with the Islanders' injury situation, prompted the summons. "To be called up was an unbelievable feeling," he said. In five games with the Islanders, he was teamed with Tim Jackman, Jon Sim and he even played some shifts with Doug Weight. He was at the rink in Phoenix when the long-serving centre scored his 1,000th point. The veteran player even offered some advice: "He told me to calm down and play my game. 'You're here for a reason,'" he recalled Weight saying.

Smith can remember some of the details of his first NHL tally, but it all happened so quickly, it remains mostly a blur.

He was coming down the right side when Jackman took a quick shot at Kiprusoff. The Calgary net-minder made the stop but was out of position for the rebound, which Smith gobbled up and put it into the mostly empty net. The crowd went wild – or at least his cheering section did, which consisted of his parents; his older brother, Derek; his cousin, who lives in Calgary; and a few friends.

Over the course of his NHL stint, Smith admits to experiencing rookie jitters. It took a while to settle down, and the Calgary experience was particularly memorable, as he grew up watching the likes of Kiprusoff and Jarome Iginla, he said.

Smith, who has visited Israel on a Birthright trip, believes it's not a matter of whether he'll return to the Islanders, it's a question of when. He now realizes he can skate and make plays at the NHL level, and with his skating ability, vision of the ice and grit, he believes he'd be an asset to the Islanders.

Obama-mania

Ahhh. Obama-mania. I had my doubts about the man at first, and I made no secret about supporting U.S. presidential candidate Hilary Clinton in the Democratic race.

However, even I couldn't help but be swept up in the whirlwind of excitement surrounding Barack Obama's recent inauguration.

I know several people who trekked to Washington, D.C., for the momentous occasion, willing to freeze it out with millions of strangers, all for the thrill of being a part of history.

On the news, it was the young people whooping and wiping tears of joy that made for the best television.

But now that Obama-mania has settled down, I have to wonder if these young voters are still paying attention to what's happening in the White House.

It's easy enough to be engaged when you watch America's charming new president spinning his elegant wife around the stage floor, with Beyoncé wiping tears away in the background.

But young voters are traditionally apathetic to world politics, and it will be interesting to see if Obama's magnetism is enough to keep us drawn to the political stage.

Obama's biggest success so far has been in his ability to inspire hope in people who have always been hopeless – both hopelessly apathetic and hopelessly marginalized. But if he is to continue being a success, he's going to need to find a way to keep people excited and involved.

On one hand, there's no reason for us not to be engaged. America's deep recession has affected everyone around the world, across educational, economic and class lines. The War on Terror is constantly threatening to strike us here at home.

The role of the United States as a superpower is on the verge of a major shift, and whether America's influence over the world will continue to wane or will continue to be a thing of valour, remains to be seen.

There's no doubt about it, it's an exciting time. We are in the midst of a turning point in history.

But like all history lessons, the class is only as exciting as the teacher at the front of the class. Obama, with his catch phrases, succinct speaking style and Hollywood friends is certainly engaging, but I have a feeling that it will take something more to keep voters emotionally invested throughout his leadership.

It's hard to inspire change when you're constantly at an arm's length away. If he is truly the people's president, then he needs to make a concerted effort to dedicate a good portion of his time connecting with people on all levels of the economic ladder.

More speaking engagements at universities, more outreach in downtrodden communities…in short, more action on the front lines of society.

Not photo ops but opportunities to convince people that they, too, can effect change.

But more than that, it will take legitimacy. This president needs to walk the walk, plain and simple.

He's made a lot of promises and has talked a lot about change. People will need to see his actions and be convinced by the results to truly understand the importance of political will.

For years, politicians have been trying to find a way to capture people's attention. Obama's got a great head start, and I'd like to see him keep it.

This president has got a long road ahead of him and a lot of people are hoping he's got what it takes to truly make a change.

We'll just have to see if indeed, yes he can.

A Family Business for over 60 Years

About Life

Dear Ella,

About three months ago, our family began seeing signs that our father's reflexes and mind were showing significant signs of aging. Our dad has always been a strong and very intelligent man who could make the right decisions no matter how difficult the situation – until now.

He's in his 83rd year of life and he's still driving daily. He has always been an excellent driver who spent many hours a day behind the wheel, but I would also classify him as an aggressive driver who follows too close, changes lanes to get ahead, etc.

Now that his reflexes are not as sharp, we're quite worried for his safety and the safety of others. We are petrified to bring this up with him, but we have no choice. Do you have any suggestions on how this should be done?

Dangerous Driving

Dear Dangerous Driving,

The loss of the ability to drive is the loss of independence. Nobody wants to be told what they can and cannot do, but there has to be a balance between personal mobility and safety. Someone like your father, for whom driving has always been second nature, is especially vulnerable.

In many provinces, it's mandatory for drivers over age 75 to have a medical every two years. This is not the case in Ontario. Here, drivers over the age of 80 must pass a mandatory vision and written test every two years, but it doesn't address reflexes and the cognitive ability to drive safely. As self analysis isn't always possible or practical, the family must step in, albeit gently. You must understand the magnitude of losing one's independence before you speak to him. If your father is close to his physician, perhaps you can get him or her involved as well.

Instead of expecting your father to give up his licence cold turkey, you could suggest a type of graduated licensing like they have for new drivers. Negotiate less driving and no nighttime or highway trips. For those times, offer to give him a ride or a taxi voucher. This may be the compromise you come to in the end, but don't expect to get there easily or quickly.

He's an intelligent man, so you should be able to appeal to his sense of reason and understanding. Give him time to get used to your suggestions. Above all, make sure he knows you are doing this because of how much you love and care for him.

The BAYT Israel mission: incredible!

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

For the last seven years, community leaders Moishe Posner and Larry Zeifman have co-ordinated a Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto (BAYT) Brotherhood Solidarity Mission to Israel.

The mission's objectives are to show unity between the shul/community and the Israel Defence Forces; to allow mission participants the chance to see a dynamic Israel and interact with its citizens; and to connect with BAYT members living, learning and/or serving in Israel.

The recent BAYT mission (Dec. 7 to 16) included a whirlwind of activities and generosity, including a tour of Hebron and a dedication of a mobile shul to the IDF. Most importantly to the mission co-ordinators, however, were visits to cities, towns and settlements affected by terrorist attacks and rockets.

While in Israel, the team visited Kfar Azza, a secular settlement situated metres away from Gaza. Recently, a Kfar Azza citizen, Jimmy Kedoshim, 48, (rest in peace), was murdered, struck down by a Qassam rocket while mowing his lawn. The day before, Jimmy had flown over Sderot, throwing candies to the children below.

In Kfar Azza, the mission participants met a kindergarten class, received arts and crafts from the children and were shown a sealed room that was used as a bomb shelter and protection from gas attacks. (How do you explain gas attacks to five year olds?)

The participants offered the children gifts in return. Graciously, the yishuv representative responded, "Baruch HaShem, we're okay. The community down the road needs it more than we do."

The BAYT mission is open to community members and included participants from the Village Shul, B'nai Torah and Or Chaim Shul. Rabbi Baruch Taub, the spiritual leader of the BAYT, is the mission rav.

Every team member carries a duffel bag of donated new winter clothing and electronics. The warm clothing was especially welcomed this year because of Israel's harsh winter.

Some of the gifts were distributed to IDF soldiers at checkpoints the team travelled through, such as Shechem, en route to Jerusalem.

One night, the team had supper in Shilo with the Eldar family. Yitzchak Yonathan (rest in peace), a young family member, was murdered last year in the terrorist attack on Yeshivat Mercaz Harav. During the dinner, his parents spoke – for the first time publicly – about their son. "They told us Yitzchak was buried with his blood-stained Gemarah. We cried with them," Moishe said.

The BAYT participants spent time in the Jordan Valley at a rehabilitation centre for teenage girls at risk called Ginat Kedem, run by Rabbi Nir Efrati and his wife, Nava. The couple works with these "troubled kids" on healing psychological wounds and prepares them for independence through a program that includes academic and Torah studies and agricultural work. Toronto community members gave the Ginat Kedem residents MP3s, digital cameras, portable DVDs and clothing.

The famous BAYT mission Shabbat dinner in Jerusalem was attended by 150 Toronto youths who are in yeshiva, seminary, university or the army. The evening included singing, words of Torah and great food. "It was a beautiful Shabbos and went on past midnight," said Arthur Rosenzweig, past president of the BAYT Brotherhood. (Of course, there was a kiddush club during Shacharit services on Shabbat, a BAYT must.)

"This mission is hugely important as a show of support for the people of Israel," Larry said.

"When you've been on our trip, you learn to have a lot of respect for the people living on the front lines of terrorist attacks or rockets launched," he concluded.

"Israelis are living the dream by making a home in Eretz Yisrael. We're not there, so this mission is second best," Moishe added.

Grandmother becomes personal trainer

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Edna Levitt says she's proof that it's never too late to start something new. The 69-year grandmother of two became a personal trainer at the age of 65.

Today, Levitt specializes in fitness training for people 50 and older (www.50plus-fitness.ca).

She does one-on-one resistance training for individuals and small groups in private homes. In collaboration with motivational speaker Susan Sommers, Levitt also does wellness seminars on fitness for people over 50. Her presentations focus on the benefits of strength training.

Levitt describes her foray into the fitness business as "totally serendipitous." She says she got the idea after a stranger commented on how fit she looked. "She said, 'I can tell you work out by the shape of your arms.'"

Relating the story to a friend, Levitt mused about becoming a certified personal trainer "My friend said, 'That's a good idea.'"

Levitt subsequently enrolled in a professional training program. It took her two tries to pass the written exam for certification, she confesses. "I was 65. I had never taken a science course before.

"I had to have a tutor in biomechanics of the human body, among other science topics. It was brutal."

Levitt had faced other difficult challenges before. She immigrated to Canada from Scotland in 1983 with her son, Michael, following the sudden death of her husband.

"I needed a fresh start," she says.

Before moving to Canada, she had never worked. Shortly after her arrival in Toronto, she enrolled at York University. "I felt I could never attempt to do anything professional unless I got educated."

Graduating at the age 50, she became a professional fundraiser. Her first job was at Baycrest.

That year, her son urged her to improve her level of fitness, she recalls. "He said, 'Mom, you're middle-aged now. It's time for you to join a gym.'"

When they went south for the winter break, Levitt, who had never exercised, took her son's advice. She went out walking every morning. When she returned from her vacation, she joined the YMCA. "I went at 6 in the morning, Monday to Friday. I can't tell you what got me committed, but within six months, I felt the difference."

Levitt held a number of fundraising and marketing jobs in the community before switching careers, and she says she has no plans to retire. "I started working so late in life, so at age 69, I don't feel burned out yet."

She says the work is very gratifying. Indeed, she recounts how she helped a grandmother who could barely walk dance at her grandson's wedding.

"I got a call last June. The woman said, 'My son's getting married in November and I'd like my 87-year-old mother to walk down the aisle.' The woman used a walker and she shuffled. She didn't lift her feet."

Levitt worked with her twice a week for an hour over five months. She says she taught her to do squats and lunges, first holding on to the table to build up confidence and strength.

By the fall, the woman was able to do the same moves with a three-pound medicine-ball. They even practised dancing, says Levitt. "My son was at the same wedding, and the woman said to him, 'Tell your mother I did the horah.'"

"It just shows you that you're never too old to do strength training. We're all a work in progress, but I'm not planning to reinvent myself again.

"I see what fitness has done for me and I see how I've helped others. I'm passionate about what I do."

Centre provides care for the caregivers

By MARNI BRINDER BYK
Special to The CJN

Dr. Joel Sadavoy

Mount Sinai Hospital recently opened The Cyril & Dorothy, Joel & Jill Reitman Centre for Alzheimer's Support and Training – the first of its kind in Toronto.

The focus of the Reitman Centre, a media representative said, is the caregivers. "Being a caregiver for a family member with Alzheimer's is a demanding task and one that can lead to increased levels of stress and depression. Rates of depression among caregivers of individuals with Alzheimer's are up to 40 per cent higher than in the general population. That is why the mental well-being of families confronted with Alzheimer's is just as important as the care provided to their loved ones."

Dr. Joel Sadavoy, director of the centre, head of geriatric psychiatry and head of community psychiatry services at Mount Sinai Hospital, stresses the need to address the training of caregivers because most of the care of those who are suffering from cognitive disease is provided at home, usually by spouses, and sometimes children.

He believes the most difficult element to face is the change of behaviour in a loved one, and most caregivers have no training and little education or information about what is causing the behaviour or what to do about it. The Reitman Centre is unique in its programming because it brings caregivers together and works through scenarios they can all learn from in a group setting.

The Reitman Centre began running its first sessions in January. Each group involves 24 caregivers who meet once a week for approximately three hours. Because it is nearly impossible for caregivers to leave their loved ones alone, a parallel group for care recipients is held at the same time. The entire process is 12 weeks total – two weeks for assessment; four weeks of group therapy, problem solving therapy and cognitive behavioural therapy; and six weeks of training.

The group therapy involves a partnership with the University of Toronto's simulated patient program, Sadavoy said.

"Simulated patients… listen to an evaluation of a family's challenges and recreate the scenario in a group setting, in order to provide the family with feedback.

"The scenarios are filmed and played back for the families, and together with the support team, they come up with a better approach to the situation."

The program is also partnered with the Alzheimer's Society of Toronto, has close ties with Baycrest and the Centre for Addiction and Mental Health geriatric program, and is working with physicians for referrals for program participants.

Sadavoy believes it is important that the Reitman Centre and this program are in a general hospital because people come to the hospital who have problems with dementia and then they are at the front line of care.

Dementia, he said, mostly remains hidden in the community and people are not aware of the various forms of assistance available. It is his hope that the Reitman Centre will provide the help needed to empower caregivers at home and make the struggle they face more bearable.

After the 12-week program, staff will maintain contact with caregivers and provide supportive followup. Sadavoy has found that even telephone contact is effective, and group conference calls will help caregivers remember that they are a part of a larger support system.

There is no cost for the services, but financial support from the community is used for transportation to get some of the caregivers and care recipients to the centre.

For information about the Reitman Centre, contact Anne-Marie Vico at 416-586-4800, ext. 5192, or fax 416-586-3231.

Former cancer patient finds humour in her illness

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Marla Lukofsky, a Toronto stand-up comedian, writer, TV and radio veteran and cancer survivor, uses her comedic talents to help those with cancer and their families face their journey through darkness and despair.

Her inspirational presentation is titled I'm Still Here and So is My Hair. Lukofsky is featured at many meetings and conferences, speaking candidly and with optimism about her own personal experiences.

Lukofsky was diagnosed with breast cancer in 1998. "I hope that my story will help others."

By adding some humour to her discussion of life-threatening challenges and referring to her own experience and her five-foot body, she transcends the negative side of life's stumbling blocks.

Speaking of her nose, she says, "I was born with my father's eyes, my mother's mouth and both my parents' noses."

The veteran entertainer of 30 years makes audiences laugh in Canada and the United States, and she speaks openly about the trials in her life: her battle with cancer, the unexpected death of her father, Lou, in 2004 followed by the diagnosis of leukemia for her mother Ruth, who died in 2006, eight months after her diagnosis.

She was also once knocked down by two dogs and broke two bones in her leg, which kept her house-bound for more than three months.

"There are funny things and sad things in my story – people laugh and people cry."

But Lukofsky looks for the positive in every situation.

While convalescing with her broken leg, she rewrote her memoir, wrote poems and prepared her speaking presentation.

Marla Lukofsky

"If I can touch even one person and have them feel that they're not alone, then I've succeeded."

She told The CJN that her sense of humour is an innate part of her personality. "It's not a coping mechanism. I want to share laughter and tears with whomever wants to experience them with me."

Lukofsky attended Bathurst Heights Collegiate and took the paralegal course at Seneca College while working as a stand-up comedian at night.

She was a member of Second City for a month, "until they realized that I wasn't Andrea Martin and they asked me to leave." (She's strongly resembles the former SCTV star.)

She represented Canada at international comedy festivals in Scotland and England. Her voice can also be heard as the Good Luck Bear on Care Bear cartoons.

Lukofsky started doing stand-up comedy in 1973 and decided after almost two decades that she wanted to be based in one city. In 1990, she moved to Los Angeles, where she continued working in stand-up comedy and as an actor.

It was in Los Angeles that she discovered the lump in her breast 10 years ago. After two mammograms that were negative, a mammography technician suggested that she have an ultrasound.

The procedure detected a small, but fast-growing tumour, and the cancer had spread to her lymph nodes. Lukofsky says she learned from this experience that if you don't feel comfortable with a diagnosis, insist on further tests.

After surgery, she had an aggressive course of chemotherapy and daily radiation.

"One night, while I lay in bed feeling extremely sick after hours of receiving chemo, a mosquito flew into my bedroom, bit me and sucked up my toxic blood. I watched it fall to the ground, lose its little black hairs and die."

With a smile she adds, "Now that's what I call sweet revenge."

A year after her surgery and treatments, Lukofsky returned to Toronto.

Recently, she has given her motivational speech at Willow Breast Cancer Support Canada, L'Chaim Cancer Support Group for Jewish Women, National Council of Jewish Women, Gilda's Club, the Saskatoon Cancer Conference and many other hospitals, fundraisers and organizations.

After each presentation, Lukofsky receives numerous letters and e-mails from cancer patients, their family members and organizers thanking her for both the educational component and the entertainment that takes her audience through a range of emotions.

She advises people to own up to their emotions. "If you feel bad and need to cry, then cry. When it's funny, laugh. And tell people what you need and what you don't need."

She stresses that it's important to listen to people with cancer. "Having a witness to your struggle is very healing."

She adds, "I'm a realist. People have a saying that a glass is half empty or half full. I see that there is a glass and there is water in it. And it's as simple as all that."

Lukofsky says she loves what she is doing. "With my speeches, I am combining my God-given talents – my stand-up, animated voices, my acting and my ability to tell stories.

"I look forward to more speaking engagements, because I want to get my message out," she says. "I also hope to publish my memoirs."

Ryerson program focuses on health communication

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

It seems that almost everywhere we turn these days, there's a barrage of information about nutrition.

Whether it's from health-care professionals in the media or on bookshelves, the nutrition news never ceases, and we're left with the challenge of making sense of it all.

To help address these challenges and opportunities, Ryerson University has launched a new nutrition communication program.

First of its kind in Canada

The first of its kind in Canada, the one-year program will give students the opportunity to earn a master's of health science degree.

"The focus of the program is taking nutrition content and communicating it effectively," says program director Rena Mendelson. "The course will involve everything from interpersonal and group communication to social marketing and specific nutrition programs."

There are 16 students enrolled in the program, the majority of whom are currently working as registered dietitians or nutrition experts.

Susan Zogheib, a dietitian originally from the United States, says she's in the program to advance her skills and gain unique experience.

"Over the course of years at college and through experience, I realized that a dietitian must often go beyond textbooks and science and employ a touch of humanity to reach the outside world," says Zogheib, 26.

Alissa Steinberg and Susan Zogheib

"I [also] wanted something different and beyond my comfort zone and... Ryerson University intrigued me because it's in the exciting city of Toronto."

As part of the program, the students have a choice between participating in a practicum or working on a major research paper.

Zogheib and fellow student Alissa Steinberg are collaborating on a research paper that explores and evaluates messages about body weight and weight loss in Canadian women's magazines.

Steinberg says she's looking forward to both pursuing her own research and communicating nutrition facts to her future clients.

"Interpreting nutrition research and understanding its impact on various sectors, as well as becoming familiar with social [factors]... that may influence health behaviour are fundamental for nutrition communication," says Steinberg, 22.

"I intend on applying this new knowledge to advance my career."

The program aims to prepare graduates for potentially working in public and community health, as well as developing policy. Counselling and advanced professional practice is also a focus.

"Because many of the students will be working with populations, they will benefit from enhancing their oral and written communication skills and understanding the nuances of communicating risk, to hopefully result in health-behaviour change," says Mendelson.

"And they are fortunate to have the opportunity to engage closely with faculty and gain some very positive experiences."

Smooth the Years Away

What can Botox® do for you?

Botox®, which is marketed as Botox Cosmetic® for cosmetic purposes, is a muscle-relaxing agent that has proven to be a safe and effective ally in the battle against the aging face. It smoothes out forehead wrinkles, frown lines (which can create an angry facial expression), crow's feet, and lines around the upper lip, and it can relax prominent neck cords. In addition, Botox® significantly reduces excessive underarm sweating.

Dr. Stephen Kraft

What does the treatment involve?

Botox® is injected into a few points either in the skin or in the muscles under the skin. It takes less than 15 minutes to perform, and patients can resumé their daily activities right away. Significant improvement is usually seen within a week, and the best result appears after a few weeks.

ACCREDITATION: Dr. Stephen Kraft is one of Canada's Botox® pioneers. In 1985, he became the first doctor in Ontario to use Botox®. Dr. Kraft has authored or co-authored more than a dozen publications on Botox®, and has lectured on that subject to Ophthalmologists, Family Physicians, Optometrists, Neurologists, and Allied Health Personnel.

CURRENTLY: Fellow, Royal College of Surgeons of Canada.

Two options for getting fit in 2009

By MARNI BRINDER BYK
Special to The CJN

On the top of most New Year's resolution lists for 2009 is getting fit, staying healthy and losing weight. However in these tough economic times, personal trainers and one-on-one fitness sessions may be too much of a luxury for those who have to curb their spending.

According to fitness experts, the hottest trend in fitness this year is group classes, and the GTA has much to offer for those looking to get fit and have fun.

Identical twin sisters Marnie and Rena Schwartz are living their dream. Dancers for most of their lives, their ViBe Dance & Fitness Studio (www.vibestudio.ca) combines their love of teaching and dancing in one package.

Now celebrating its seventh year of business, ViBE offers a wide variety of classes for both boys and girls, starting at age three and for all levels of ability.

"The people who come to ViBE are people who love music and people who feel good about themselves," Marnie tells me after I took their Monday night GPT (group personal training) class for adults.

Their trademark motto "sweat and smile" is easily achieved by the class participants, who laugh at the personal stories the twins tell in between teaching.

They banter back and forth, finish each other's sentences, and before you know it, the class is almost over.

When you're at ViBE, you feel like you are a part of a family. Taking the class is their aunt, and sitting off to one side is their bubbie, who turns 90 this year and has been watching the girls dance for years.

Although she doesn't participate, she comes every Monday night, which adds to the feeling of inclusiveness in the class.

As Marnie and Rena instruct the class and entertain, they also demonstrate the correct way to execute the steps for the best results, often using each other to model what's right and wrong. They also make sure to encourage each person individually to make sure everyone is getting the most out of the class and is feeling the vibe.

ViBE prides itself on providing a recreational atmosphere for enjoying and participating in dance in a non-competitive atmosphere. The average student comes one to two hours a week, compared to the 15 hours you sometimes have to commit to when you are a competitive dancer.

They think it's important for their students to have time for other interests and be able to dance as little or as much as they want. Health is the focus, not medals.

They believe that it's important to encourage children to enjoy a healthy lifestyle while they're still young in order to establish physical activity as a part of their lifestyle, which will benefit them into adulthood.

At Not the Norm Fitness (notthenormfitness@gmail.com) Leah Posluns Tellez transformed an old 2,000-square-foot showroom in the Castlefield Caledonia Design and Décor District into a beautifully decorated Pilates studio, and she did it in only two weeks.

"We did a paint job, equipped the studio and resurfaced the floors – oh, and decorated, of course!"

The décor is worth mentioning at Not the Norm Fitness, because it includes dozens of her Grampa Irving Posluns' photographs from around the globe, including some magnificent portraits from India.

The photos help to create a Zen-like atmosphere in this open concept studio that is filled with all the equipment needed to take a first-rate Pilates class.

Posluns Tellez's family has influenced every aspect of this studio. Not the Norm Fitness is a tribute to her health-guru zaide, Norman Solmon, because he always "pushed you to do things 100 per cent."

Posluns Tellez's mother, Gail Posluns, introduced her to Pilates, and she comes to her daughter's "long and lean" Pilates class every week.

This class, which I attended with Pilates enthusiast Janet Hay, is a mat class in which small props are used for the various exercises. Stability balls, foam rollers and toning balls are used throughout the one-hour class, and Posluns Tellez fuses her Pilates knowledge with cardiovascular exercise.

The average class size at Not the Norm Fitness is six people, which Posluns Tellez believes is just the right size. Any larger and she believes her clients don't get enough attention and that may lead to injuries. Posluns Tellez, who was certified at Toronto's well-known STOTT Pilates, uses her understanding of anatomy and medical/muscular education to ensure her students are not doing any harm to their muscles and joints under her watchful eye.

Posluns Tellez said that she believes in "teaching the value of 'exercising to live' and not the other way around, so that my clients may succeed outside of the studio. The transferability of my lessons to everyday life is what makes my classes different."

Acupuncturist helps patients heal themselves

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Dr. Michael A. Cohen, a Toronto-based chiropractor and acupuncturist, is known for his innovative approach to treatment.

He combines Eastern healing traditions that focus on the mind-body connection and self healing with chiropractic medicine.

Lately, several hospitals, rehabilitation clinics, sports teams, dancers and even celebrities have become supporters of his self-healing work. They recommend using the Acuball, a self-healing device that he invented.

Cohen (416-784-4000) treats a variety of conditions that include back, neck and shoulder pain; knee, leg and hip problems; repetitive strain injuries and headaches at the Allen Road Mind-Body Clinic (619 Lawrence Ave. W.). He says his chiropractic patients' conditions respond well to the integration of chiropractic medicine with native healing traditions.

Over the past 15 years, he has studied these techniques in such places as Indonesia, China, India, the Philippines, Tibet and the Amazon. In fact, his acupuncture diploma is from the Kalubowila Hospital in Sri Lanka.

"In Beijing, self-healing is part of the hospital system," he explains. "When I came back from China, I said to myself, 'I have to do this in my own practice.' It never made sense to me to give someone else the complete task of healing the body.

"What was so interesting in China was that when the patient does their own healing, they generate healing energy."

Cohen says he aims to integrate self healing with the chiropractic adjustments and acupuncture treatment he offers in his office. "The best thing for patients is to go to a practitioner and also do their own healing work.

"I take the time to educate patients about why they feel the way they do. We empower them to heal themselves as much as possible."

One of the tools Cohen uses to foster self-healing is the Acuball, he says. "It took me seven years to develop."

The small knobby rubber ball uses heat and pressure to ease tension in the back, shoulders, neck and even the feet, he explains. "It's the world's first heatable ball. You put it in the microwave for 50 seconds, and it generates one hour of heat."

He advises placing the Acuball on the shoulder or back or any area of pain and tension. "My mother sleeps with it every night to release her hip. It's great, because there's no medication involved."

Cohen notes that the Acuball, which has been on the market for two years, is being used in rehabilitation clinics, hospitals and yoga and Pilates studios.

"The reason hospitals like it is that they give it to the patient so that when they're at home they can release some of the tightness in the muscles and joints. The muscles and joints contract after the surgery as the body responds to the trauma," he says.

"Today it's about patient empowerment. Pain can motivate people to get active in their own healing."

In his own practice, he finds that people who practise self- healing need less clinical treatment. "It reduces patient visits by about 50 per cent."

Ted Grosberg, 65, who has been Cohen's patient for about a year, says he has always been open to Eastern medicine practices such as acupuncture. He initially sought chiropractic treatment for a neck injury. After Cohen did some adjustments to alleviate the discomfort in Grosberg's neck, he addressed other long-standing areas of pain.

Grosberg says he finds Cohen's technique of focusing on one specific problem area at a time very effective. "He spends a lot of time identifying the area of pain and works on those muscles. He'll only do two or three adjustments at a time."

Grosberg says that between clinic visits, he uses the Acuball. "I get great results in a few minutes. It's like a massage or strong accupressure. It's an excellent release."

He is among many fans of the Acuball. The device is also used by Richard Branson of Virgin Records fame, Canadian singer Sarah McLachlan, players in the National Hockey League and National Basketball Association, and dancers in the National Ballet of Canada, including the company's artistic director, former prima ballerina Karen Kain.

For Cohen, the growing popularity of the Acuball supports his belief in the importance of self-healing for both acute and chronic pain.

"How many thousands of people are out there that don't realize that they have the power to help themselves?"

For information on the Acuball go to wwwacuball.com.

Conscious creation brings joy and fulfilment

By DORA NUDELMAN
Special to The CJN

What is conscious creation? Well, the easiest way to explain it is by talking about what it's not – it's not what I like to call robotic creation.

In robotic creation, you go about your day allowing people and circumstances to push your buttons. You get angry at the incompetence of the mail delivery person or the checkout clerk at the grocery store, the guy who seemingly cut you off on the road, your friend or business associate for not returning your call, your spouse for not appreciating the hard work you put into the family. You get upset when someone tells you you're too short, too fat, too blonde, too intelligent – too this and too that.

Basically then, robotic creation is allowing people and circumstances outside of you to control how you feel on the inside. Subsequently, you create for yourself a life of pain, heartache, tension, stress, anger, frustration, depression, and the list unfortunately goes on and on.

So robotic creation doesn't sound very productive, does it? Think about it: if you can co-create your life through your consciousness, feelings and actions, then why would you choose to create a robotic, miserable life? It's like choosing an expired carton of eggs when there's a fresh one sitting right next to it.

So what's the alternative?

It's conscious creation: it happens when you understand the role you play in your own life. You are willing to take responsibility for whatever comes into your life because you know that you created it somehow within your own consciousness. Because of this, you always choose to be happy, to forgive rather than resent, to appreciate rather than begrudge.

Dora Nudelman

Conscious creation involves an awareness of consciousness. You intentionally make choices that come from the highest part of you rather than from your ego. You know that you, and only you, decide what you think at any given moment. You know that being reactive only gives your power away to others.

A client came to me with stress-related issues. She was feeling irritable and dissatisfied, mainly with her health and her inability to communicate effectively with others. Her primary issue was that she had an incessant need to control everyone and everything in her life. She wanted everything to be according to her own agenda. If it wasn't, she would get irritated, snappy and physically sick. This need to control others essentially became something that controlled her. Robotically, she had been reacting to situations and people. She was blaming others for making her feel unhealthy and stressed.

In the 10-step protocol I use in my practice, one of the steps includes taking responsibility. This step is crucial in the conscious creation process because it is only when we take responsibility that we can start to create the reality that we want.

So in coaching my client through this step, I helped her realize that she controlled her own thoughts, that other people weren't making her feel anything. She was making herself sick, unhappy, irritated and angry because she was choosing to respond in this way.

She thought the only way to be happy was if others changed in accordance with her expectations. What she came to realize was that it was up to her to change from within and that this was the only way to see changes from without. In practising her tools and exercises, she noticed that as she became calmer and more content, her environment started to change as well. By releasing the need to control others, she gained more control over herself and her surroundings.

So now it's time for you to decide. Will you choose robotic creation, filled with pain and hardship? Or will you choose conscious creation, filled with infinite joy and fulfilment? It's your choice.

A healthy body requires healthy feet

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Have you ever given thought to the amount of time you spend standing on your feet each day?

Between work, home and leisure, the steps you log on your heels and toes really add up.

To help you stay mobile and prevent all of this wear and tear from leading to any one of 300 foot conditions or other health issues, proper foot care is very important.

"With good foot health, people tend to be more comfortable on their feet," says Dr. Alan Silverstein, a Toronto-based podiatrist.

"And one of the keys to good foot health is inspecting your feet on a regular basis."

Silverstein notes that during an inspection, you should check for such things as sores, cracks, redness and the temperature.

Dry skin, tingling, numbness and discoloration are also symptoms to watch out for.

Proper foot care also involves keeping your feet clean, exercising on a regular basis, including doing toe stretches and wearing good quality shoes.

It's best to bathe your feet with a mild soap daily in lukewarm water.

Monitoring and cutting your nails diligently is also an important part of proper foot hygiene.

Be sure to cut your toenails straight across to avoid ingrown toenails, and don't snip them too short.

When it comes to shoes, experts emphasize wearing the right size and ensuring you can walk smoothly, without pain.

It's ideal to not wear the exact same pair of shoes every day and being in shoes that are appropriate for the type of activity you are participating in.

Other critical components are comfort, stability, cushioning and making sure the mechanics of the shoe mesh well with your feet.

An increasingly popular method people are choosing to help relieve pressure areas on their feet are orthotics.

Orthotics, which are devices placed in shoes to support or correct musculoskeletal deformities, have the potential to decrease pain in your feet and potentially in other parts of the body, including your lower back, knee and hips.

Alan Silverstein

They have also been shown to prevent a deformed foot from developing additional problems.

"Orthotics are very helpful for controlling the function of the foot," says Silverstein, who has been a podiatrist for more than 35 years.

"You can buy them over the counter, as well as custom made. It's unlikely orthotics will cure the problem entirely, but they certainly can alleviate them."

Silverstein notes that an insole can also be an option to deal with such common foot ailments as corns and calluses.

At the end of the day, your feet support your whole body, so taking good care of them really is taking good care of you.

A healthy attitude may help prevent eating disorders

By MICHELE FOSTER
Special to The CJN

We live in a society where people are often plagued by a fear of fat. Recent data from Israel demonstrates that 74 per cent of girls in Grade 10 are on diets, although only 12 per cent are actually overweight.

Many argue that people's obsession with appearance has led directly to an increase in disordered eating, particularly among girls and women.

While there is no sure-fire way to prevent eating disorders, there are some steps that parents can take to protect their children from having a poor body-image and a fear of fat, both of which have been associated with disordered eating.

It is never too early to help your children develop a positive relationship with food. In fact, studies show that many girls go on their first diet before the age of 14.

Planning regular family meals together encourages children to become involved in a regular eating routine. Parents should try to include all food groups in every meal, and not avoid serving carbohydrates like pasta, or cooking with healthy fats such as some vegetable oils or olive oil.

Removing foods from the dinner plate teaches children that some foods are "bad," and we all know the appeal of forbidden foods... just ask Eve! In fact, studies show that these "forbidden foods," especially carbohydrates and sweets, are the ones that bulimics tend to binge on. Instead of labelling foods negatively, teach children that all foods are good, but that some are better for them in moderation.

Jewish customs often revolve around sharing large meals together, and while grandmothers lovingly nudging us to clear our plates is often a Shabbat dinner tradition, this can actually prevent children from paying attention to their natural hunger cues. Instead, children can be taught to listen to their bodies and to eat when hungry and stop when full.

Children can be taught to listen to their bodies and to eat when hungry and stop when full

In addition, parents should pay close attention to how they talk about their own bodies, particularly in the presence of their children. Hearing a mother talk about her latest diet, feeling fat or not liking her thighs tells children and teens that hating our body is okay.

Furthermore, parents should ensure that they do not communicate negatively about their children's bodies, either verbally or with their behaviour, as kids easily pick up on these messages. Instead, children can be praised for their personalities and for the unique characteristics that make them who they are. Offering kids and teens compliments only about their physical appearance or strength teaches them that the outside is what matters most.

Finally, parents who hear their children comment negatively about their own appearance or the appearance of others should not be afraid to challenge their kids. For example, if you hear your children say that being fat is synonymous with being gross or lazy, ask them why they think this, and help them discover whether these stereotypes are true for people in their own lives.

It's never too early or too late to make these changes in your family's lifestyle. For more information on preventing eating disorders, or to help someone who is suffering from one, visit the National Eating Disorder Information Centre at www.nedic.ca.

Ayelet Bercovich and her daughter

Rest assured that mom knows best

By AYELET BERCOVICH
Special to The CJN

It's 8:50 p.m., and my daughter is mumbling her ABCs, fumbling through the "N-N-N-O-P" part. She's lying down in her bed after her bath and she's finished her milk. She is looking up at the butterflies hanging from the wall, singing to her hands, and looking at me from time to time smiling from ear to ear.

She is not sleeping yet, and to be honest, I love every minute of it.

But shhh… don't let the mommy groups know.

Before I gave birth, I was adamant that I would sign up for every possible mommy group activity, thinking no one could understand me better than another mother. I did. I joined a ton of activities and met many new moms with whom I shared coffee after class.

This was enjoyable enough until the gatherings stopped being friendly and turned into a contest of who was raising their kids the best.

My confidence as a new mom was shattered one day when one mother brought her "life-saving" book about babies and their sleeping habits to one of our coffee dates.

I suddenly felt like our relaxing meetings were turning into child psychology classes with a different PhD lecturer/mom every week.

I couldn't help but second guess most of my decisions as a new mom – especially about my baby's sleeping and eating habits. Apparently, I was supposed to toughen up and let my daughter cry for three hours because, as the moms said, "it's the only way she'll learn to fall asleep."

Another time, I overheard a conversation between two mothers, and one proudly claimed that her daughter "has never tasted salt, sugar or meat!" I kept picturing my daughter's nighttime ritual of sitting on her red Elmo chair, enjoying her blue popsicle while watching The Wiggles. Was I doing something wrong?

When I explained my overwhelming emotions about mommy groups to my doctor, he gave me a quick reality check: "You know, Ayelet, after so many years of treating children, one day I'll also write a parenting book. It will have thousands of pages in it, all empty!" he told me.

If you're a new mom, you are no stranger to the immense pressure that comes with the experience. There's the gossip, the cliques and the critiques – all while you're doing the hokey pokey and smiling to your baby.

Raving about your little ones is inevitable – that's how mommy groups naturally form. However, it doesn't need to feel like a gruelling competition. You must trust your own instincts. You are doing the best for your kids and no one can pass judgment on that.

I eventually did find that small percentage of sensible, supportive mothers who do not judge me when I tell them that I spent a good portion of last night in my daughter's bed. Those are the women who have become my friends, the ones I never hesitate to turn to for support.

Centre helps seniors keep moving

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Physical activity is essential for good health no matter what your age or medical condition. Yet, many individuals with chronic conditions, seniors with limitations and people completing a rehabilitation program are afraid to exercise.

"Often they don't know where to begin and how to exercise safely," says Jan Goldstein Elman, who last year founded One Step Ahead Mobility with her partner Rebecca Gruber.

Goldstein Elman and Gruber have been practising physiotherapists for more than 20 years, focusing on the elderly and those with chronic illnesses – Parkinson's disease, arthritis, heart disease, diabetes, osteoporosis, multiple sclerosis and other conditions.

"We use a variety of specialized programs, treatment techniques and technologies to help clients reach their full physical potential," Gruber says.

One Step Ahead Mobility, located at Bathurst and Glencairn, is the first community-based physiotherapy clinic that concentrates solely on physical mobility for adults with chronic illnesses. Its motto is "Learn to exercise to your ability."

In addition to holding bachelor degrees in physiotherapy, both also have master's degrees from the University of Toronto, Gruber in rehabilitation sciences and Goldstein Elman in health promotion.

Now on the faculty of the physical therapy department at U of T, both worked at Baycrest Centre for more than 15 years, treating residents and outpatients.

"This gave us our appreciation and the experience to help older people with complex chronic conditions," Gruber says.

She explains that it takes special training to cater to people with a number of problems.

"As an example, if you have a chronic condition and have an injury, rehabilitation is far more complex."

They both worked at the Centre for Movement Disorders, a specialized neurological clinic for people with Parkinson's disease located in Markham.

"We recognized that there was a need for this specialized therapy in the core of the city, and [last] February, we opened One Step Ahead Mobility," Goldstein Elman says.

With word of mouth, doctor recommendations and referrals from agencies, "we are delighted that we are able to help so many people with diverse medical needs," she says.

Along with individual programs and group exercise classes in the gym at the clinic, they also provide in-home assessments and consultations throughout the GTA.

"People in North America are living longer, in part because we are surviving illnesses that once shortened life," Goldstein Elman says, "and more people are living with chronic disease."

Scientific studies show that by age 60, people have on average 2.5 chronic illnesses, and the number continues to increase with age.

"Our clinic helps to address the ongoing specific needs of people who want to live well despite their challenges," Gruber notes.

She stresses that these people need guidance to adapt the exercise to their individual personal needs and to help prevent injury during therapy and exercise sessions.

"Improving mobility and maintaining a level of activities helps prevent complications of existing conditions.

"Along with specialized treatments, we have special equipment geared to their limitations and mobility restrictions such as supportive equipment for people who have balance problems."

For more information on One Step Ahead Mobility, call 416-783-7175 or visit their website at www.onestepaheadmobility.com.

Gaza fallout hits Canadian universities

McGill defers motion

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The McGill University student union was obliged to shelve a proposed anti-Israel resolution after a motion brought by opponents was carried at a general assembly last week.

By a vote of 436-263, undergraduates agreed that the resolution should be "postponed indefinitely" because the Student Society of McGill University (SSMU) is not the appropriate forum for debate over the Palestinian-Israeli conflict.

SSMU president Kay Turner told The CJN that the decision means the resolution is "effectively killed," but does not prevent a similar resolution being put forward for consideration at a future SSMU general assembly.

Activists with the Hillel Jewish student association, which had mobilized many of the opponents, were behind the motion to shelve.

"This is a very symbolic victory," said Dan Hadad, Hillel director of advocacy, "It sends a message that the SSMU is not the forum for discussing Middle East issues. The right place is on campus, between students and clubs…

"It also sends a message that we will not stand for injustice. It's a victory not only for Jewish students and Israel, but for all of McGill."

The SSMU represents the nearly 20,000 undergraduates attending McGill.

Altercations at UBC

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The RCMP is investigating two separate incidents at the University of British Columbia involving a pro-Palestinian student who allegedly assaulted two Jewish students after Hamas and PLO posters were torn from his dorm room door.

An RCMP news release stated that on Jan. 31 at 8:30 p.m., a group of four Jewish students were roaming the halls of UBC Place Vanier Residence filming a documentary for their Jewish fraternity when they came across a dorm room with Hamas and PLO posters on the door.

As one of the students tore down the posters, the student to whom the posters belonged heard a commotion outside his door and confronted the group. The four students ran away, but one was caught by the pro-Palestinian student and an altercation ensued, police said.

The pro-Palestinian student reportedly restrained the Jewish student until UBC resident advisers arrived, and he alleged that the Jewish student hurled racial slurs at him during the fight.

About 45 minutes later, six other Jewish students came to the Vanier residence. The pro-Palestinian student saw the group outside his door, chased them away and got into a physical altercation with another Jewish student.

The News in Brief

Canada

Shul Attack Decried

OTTAWA — Ottawa last week condemned the recent attack on the main synagogue in Caracas, Venezuela. Up to 15 people attacked the shul overnight on Jan. 30-31, damaging Torah scrolls and spraying graffiti such as "death to the Jews" on the walls. A shul guard was also bound and gagged at gunpoint. "We urge the government of Venezuela to follow through on their commitment to investigate this crime and bring the perpetrators to justice," Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs Peter Kent said.

NDP Chides Church

OTTAWA — The NDP's Charlie Angus has urged his fellow MPs to "speak out" against the Pope's decision to welcome back into the Catholic fold Bishop Richard Williamson, "a notorious supporter of the lies of [Holocaust denier Ernst] Zundel." Angus, his party's heritage and culture critic, said last week in the House of Commons that the bishop "has consorted with the Zundel defenders" and claimed "that no Jews died in the gas chambers. By rehabilitating [him], the church has shown a surprising indifference to the international fight against Holocaust denial." In 1989, the bishop "was investigated by Canadian police after he publicly defended Zundel from the pulpit of a Canadian church," Angus said on his website.

Caracas Jews Protest

CARACAS — The Jewish community of Caracas protested a Jan. 30 attack on a shul. Dozens of protesters, many holding flags of Israel and Venezuela, gathered Feb. 5 outside Caracas' main synagogue, the El Universal newspaper reported. "We do not talk politics in these premises," the head of the Venezuelan Israeli Association, Elías Farache, said. "Here we meet, we pray, we gather… For this reason, we feel outraged and devastated." More than a dozen armed men stormed the shul, desecrating religious items, scrawling threatening messages on walls, and stealing information on the Jewish community. The government condemned the attack and blamed it on the political opposition, but many Jews accuse President Hugo Chavez of fomenting anti-Jewish feelings by criticizing Israel. Some of his backers shouted pro-Palestine slogans at the ralliers.

Looted Art Deal

NEW YORK — Two Picasso paintings claimed by a German Jewish scholar will remain in New York. Under undisclosed terms of the settlement, the Museum of Modern Art and the Solomon Guggenheim Foundation will retain the works that were sought by the family of Paul von Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, who allegedly was forced by the Nazis to part with them. The museums had denied the paintings were acquired under duress.

Judge Has Surgery

NEW YORK — Judge Ruth Bader Ginsburg, 75, the first Jewish woman on the U.S. Supreme Court, had surgery for pancreatic cancer Feb. 5 in New York. She was to stay in hospital for seven to 10 days. A lesion was discovered in a routine checkup and further tests revealed a one-centimetre-wide, early-stage tumour, the court said.

School Board Rebukes CUPE's Ryan

TORONTO — The Toronto District School Board sent a letter last week to Sid Ryan, president of CUPE Ontario, expressing strong disapproval of his recent proposal to have his union urge Canadian universities to sanction Israeli academics and post-secondary institutions in the wake of the Gaza conflict.

Trustees Josh Matlow, who tabled the motion calling for the letter at the TDSB's Feb. 4 meeting, and James Pasternak, who seconded it, thanked TDSB chair John Campbell and the board for "their principled stand against intolerance." CUPE local 4400 represents the TDSB's education support workers.

"The nature and tone of your remarks are contrary to the spirit with which our staff, your members, support their students," Campbell wrote to Ryan. "While your comments were directed at universities and not school boards, they can leave the impression that you think that children (and adults) from some cultures should be less welcome in our schools than others. This is contrary to both TDSB policy and to the daily commitment demonstrated by our staff who are members of CUPE 4400."

Bloc MP's e-mail disturbs Jewish groups

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Jewish organizations are appalled that a Member of Parliament sent an e-mail to all 307 other MPs containing links to images glorifying radical Islamic groups that are listed as terrorist groups by the Canadian government, as well as graphic photos of Palestinian casualties during the recent Israeli military operation in Gaza.

The unsolicited material, headlined Gaza Daily Bulletin, was sent by Maria Mourani, the Bloc Québécois member for the Montreal riding of Ahuntsic on Feb. 3, with the cover letter, "My goal was to show the impact not only on the people but also on the imagination of a large part of the population. This violence feeds tension and extremism and cannot lead to a lasting solution.

"As some people have noted, beyond photos of this terrible reality, a violent and hateful propaganda is emerging that unfortunately is spreading throughout the Middle East and around the world."

After the matter was raised in the House of Commons by Prime Minister Stephen Harper, and after Bloc leader Gilles Duceppe publicly rebuked her, Mourani later apologized in the House.

"My intention was to show the horrors of the war, since innocent civilians can be victims, as well as the destruction it causes. However, before forwarding the bulletin to all members, I did not consult all the links included in the e-mail, as I should have.

Contains links to images glorifying terrorist groups

"Some of those links lead the reader to sites with videos containing hate propaganda, which I do not support in any way. In fact, I condemn it."

The Quebec-Israel Committee (QIC) and B'nai Brith Canada had asked Mourani to apologize. The groups say that the Canadian Arab Federation was the source of the material and that it must cease to disseminate material that is hateful propaganda and promotes terrorism.

The e-mail included links to 14 videos and clips on the website www.youtube.com, each lasting several minutes. The Jewish groups say these originated with groups supporting Hamas, the Al-Aqsa Martyrs' Brigade and Islamic Jihad.

A brief survey uncovered images of uniformed and masked men brandishing guns and girding themselves with bombs, the flags and symbols of Hamas and other groups, and a map of Israel indicating that it is under Islamic dominance. The writing is mainly in Arabic.

What is clear are the 32 photos showing bloodied casualties, including children, and devastation of property. There are links to dozens of other photos said to depict life in a United Nations compound during the 21-day conflict, and to articles in major newspapers and on websites such as Palestinian Think Tank, whose logo is a brain atop an army tank, critical of Israel or questioning its legitimacy.

The e-mail concludes with a plea for contributions to the Palestinian General Federation of Trade Unions to assist in humanitarian relief in Gaza.

QIC executive director Luciano Del Negro said Mourani's defence that she did not screen everything in the e-mail before sending it out does not absolve her of responsibility. "She is either extremely naïve or a knave, and I think it's probably the latter," he said.

He noted that it's not the first time Mourani has aired controversial views on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. In August 2006 she accused Israel of committing war crimes in its conflict with Hezbollah, after she returned from a visit sponsored by the National Council on Canada-Arab Relations.

She quickly softened her remarks when they made headlines, saying she sided with then-UN human rights high commissioner Louise Arbour's assessment that war crimes may have been committed by both sides.

For the record

From the editor's desk...

A number of readers contacted The CJN last week indignant at the Sunday Star of Feb. 1 for its coverage of the unintended deaths of three daughters and a niece of Dr. Ezzeldeen Abu al-Aish at the hands of the Israel Defence Forces during the fighting in the recent Gaza War.

It was not the fact of the coverage that annoyed the readers. They each expressed sadness and sympathy for the girls' unnecessary deaths and for the family that had been so irremediably devastated.

Rather, what enraged them was the timing of the story, appearing nearly two weeks after the ceasefire, and especially its expansive, sweeping nature.

The Star dedicated three pages – virtually the entire front page and two full facing pages – to the story written by Oakland Ross.

Ross was masterful in introducing Abu al-Aish to the readers, relating the impact of the tragedy and describing the response to it by angry Palestinians and disconsolate Israelis.

But the account of the circumstances of the deaths on Jan. 16 depicted by Ross was, unfortunately, one-sided and short on the full details of the horrible mishap. Ross wrote two sentences toward the end of the piece that purported to give the Israeli account of the event.

The purpose of the story, Ross and his editors would say, was to describe for Canadian readers the horrific, unimaginable distress of Abu al-Aish and his family who are considering an opportunity to relocate in Toronto. It was not to retread the sodden ground of the Palestinian-Israeli conflict.

But without a full accounting of the circumstances of the tragic deaths of Abu al-Aish's three daughters and his niece, the three-page story is a heavy-handed, unfair, emotion-packed indictment of Israel and, in some corners, of course, effectively incitement against the Jewish state.

The fuller accounting of the details of the event were reported by the investigation into the tragic incident by the IDF, which was made public last week.

The investigation was conducted by the commanders of the forces in the area, as well as the division commander, and was approved by officer in charge of the Southern Command and the head of the IDF Operations Branch.

I reproduce the salient parts of the investigation results.

"The conclusions found that two shells were fired from an IDF tank resulting in the deaths of Abu al-Aish's three daughters.

"A force from the Golani Infantry Brigade operated in the area of Sajaiya for several days, during which they were engaged in face-to-face combat… also located tunnels used for ambushing and attacking IDF forces and identified homes which were booby-trapped.

"On that Friday [Jan. 16], the force came under sniper and mortar fire in an area laden with explosives and IEDs (improvised explosive devices). The force identified and located the source of fire from a house adjacent to that of the doctor's and, in response, opened fire.

"During the counter-fire opened by the IDF forces, suspicious figures were identified in the upper level of Abu al-Aish's house and were thought to be spotters who directed the Hamas sniper and mortar fire. Upon assessing the situation in the field while under heavy fire, the commander of the force gave the order to open fire on the suspicious figures. It is from this fire that the three daughters of Abu al-Aish were killed.

"Following the opening of fire, screams were heard from the direction of the house, and immediately the IDF force ceased all fire. Only later was it understood that this was in fact the house of Abu al-Aish. When contact was made with the doctor, the IDF force operated in order to allow for ambulances to evacuate the injured via the Erez Crossing for immediate emergency medical treatment in Israel.

"The IDF Spokesperson Unit stresses that in the days leading up to the incident, Abu al-Aish was contacted personally several times by officers in the Coordination and Liaison Administration in order to urge the doctor to evacuate his home, as many others already had because of Hamas operations and the intense fighting that was already taking place in that area for several days.

"The IDF Spokesperson Unit also emphasizes that in addition to the personal contact made directly with Abu al-Aish, the IDF issued warnings to the residents of Sajaiya by dropping thousands of leaflets as well as issuing warnings via Palestinian media outlets.

"The IDF is saddened by the harm caused to the Abu al-Aish family, but at the same time states that considering the constraints of the battle scene, the amount of threats that endangered the force and the intensity of fighting in the area, the forces' action and the decision to fire towards the building were reasonable."

Honesty, justice, fairness and the sorrowful, wrenching tug of compassion demand the truer, fuller accounting of the facts of the Jan. 16 tragedy. Such an accounting does not diminish the depth of the loss suffered by Abu al-Aish's family, as even the IDF acknowledged, but it explains how the loss occurred. The Sunday Star may not have felt it worthy to do so, but we certainly do.

CHALLAH HOUSE: Eighteen Jewish women in their 20s recently took part in a monthly program titled "Challah for Chesed" at the House, a midtown Jewish centre that provides educational experiences for young adults. The program taught participants the art of baking and braiding challah, as well as about sharing with people in need, why Jews use challah and deeper meanings of Shabbat.

BBYO genocide program puts focus on Darfur

By RITA POLIAKOV
Special to The CJN

Sixteen-year-old Maya Feldberg was not at a party on Saturday, Jan. 31. She wasn't at a movie, a friend's house or a restaurant, either. Instead, she spent the night learning about genocide.

That Saturday, the B'nai Brith Youth Organization (BBYO) held a 12-hour Genocide Aware-a-thon.

The participants, a group of 30 to 40 teenagers, learned about the genocide in Darfur, Sudan, where at least 400,000 people have been killed since February 2003. Through guest speakers, discussions and activities, the teenagers learned the history and significance of the conflict.

"It's good – we're getting a lot of knowledge in a short period of time," said Feldberg, who joined BBYO two months ago. "You can look at it from different points of view and discuss different points of view."

Along with raising awareness, the Genocide Aware-a-thon raised more than $1,400 for the Jewish World Watch's solar cooker project. The Jewish World Watch, an organization that helps raise awareness of and combats human rights violations, provides solar cookers for women in refugee camps. Each $30 donation provides one cooker. Without a cooker, women are often sent out to collect firewood, a task that can take one hour to one full day to complete. While looking for firewood, many women are raped and beaten by enemy militias.

When 17-year-old Sarah Katz, the organizer of the event and BBYO's Lake Ontario regional vice-president, first heard about the genocide in Darfur, it hit close to home.

"It has to do with the fact that my grandparents are Holocaust survivors," she said.

Katz, learned about the genocide in her high school civics class and participated in a Darfur rally.

"I just kept picturing my grandparents being in these situations. It was very heart-wrenching. I started researching, reading about it. It got me emotional, that turned into fuel to be proactive."

When planning the event, Katz first wanted to recreate a refugee camp, but eventually decided on an aware-a-thon.

"The whole program is meant to get people more aware… of themselves and other human beings around them and to see how we're inter-related," she said.

The first speaker of the night was Debbie Bodkin, a sergeant with the Waterloo Regional Police Service. Bodkin told the teenagers about her experience as a fact-finding volunteer for the United States and the United Nations in Darfur.

While in Darfur, Bodkin spent her days interviewing refugees. Their experiences were different, but their stories rarely changed. Many refugees spoke about being bombarded in their villages, first by government planes and trucks, and then by the Sudanese-supported Janjaweed militia. The militia would often beat and rape the women in the village and kill the remaining men.

"The youngest was seven, the oldest was 60 – both were gang raped," Bodkin told the teenagers.

"The overwhelming thing was the strength of the people," she said, adding that, before they told their stories, the women would often offer Bodkin food and water, both of which were in short supply.

For Ismail Adam, the second speaker of the night, the aware-a-thon demonstrates the power of charity.

Adam is the president of the Darfur Association of Canada, a non-profit organization that raises awareness about the genocide in Darfur, and has been to several similar events.

"Just to learn to give – it's a powerful thing to do. People who learn early in life the value of giving will be leaders of the world," he said.

Organization aims to boost soldiers' morale

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

IDF Col. (Res.) Geva Rapp, deputy commander of Israeli ground forces in Gaza during Operation Cast Lead, cancelled a planned visit to Toronto after cutting short a lecture tour in England, for fear of being arrested on charges of war crimes there.

Instead, Israeli lawyer Yehouda Zareskey replaced him in Toronto, beginning Jan. 29, as a representative of Panim el Panim (Face to Face), the non-profit organization Rapp founded to strengthen Jewish identity in Israeli soldiers. Zareskey spoke at a few Orthodox congregations, including Clanton Park Synagogue, and met with representatives of some Jewish day schools here.

Zareskey, 52 – a seventh-generation Israeli on his mother's side, who is currently volunteering for Panim el Panim – also met with Nir Sela, executive director of the Association for the Soldiers of Israel – Canada, and is beginning a Purim campaign under the auspices of the association to arrange for mishloach manot packages to be sent to soldiers in Israel.

According to the Jerusalem Post, Rapp was in England to explain Israel's position on the recent Gaza hostilities and refute media representations of what took place. On Jan. 29, about 80 pro-Palestinian protesters demonstrated outside the offices of the Union of Jewish Students in London, where Rapp was scheduled to speak. The event was cancelled, as were events in Manchester and New York, where Rapp was also expected to speak.

Zareskey, who was in Toronto for two weeks, said Rapp had been advised not to proceed with his trip to Toronto.

Rapp and Zareskey are contemporaries and religious Zionists, Zareskey said. He said that Rapp started Panim el Panim after Israel pulled out of Gaza and evicted settlers from Gush Katif in 2005. He wanted to boost the morale of religious Israeli soldiers, and give strength to non-religious Israelis who are about to begin their Israel Defence Forces (IDF) service.

"[Rapp's] message is achdut Yisrael," Zareskey told The CJN in an interview at Clanton Park, referring to Jewish unity both within Israel among different segments of the community, and between Israel and the Diaspora. "This is the main thing Israel needs."

Panim el Panim also works with Israelis on kibbutzim, he added.

Yehouda Zareskey

Through the organization, IDF soldiers have received about 1,000 e-mails of support from Jewish students in Toronto.

Zareskey said IDF soldiers are fighting not only for Israel but on behalf of the Diaspora. "This is against terror. In Israel, we say that there is not a country in the world that missiles will come to their citizens for eight years, [and they will not fight back]. It's not eight days. It's not eight months. It's eight years... It's our right to protect ourselves."

He said Rapp planned to share first-hand accounts of the war in Gaza and explain Israel's right to defend itself.

Zareskey also said Panim el Panim "does conversations about the [IDF's] values... to behave like human beings."

There are about 70 IDF soldiers who are from Toronto originally, Zareskey said. He spoke of the possibility of Toronto institutions "adopting" units with Toronto-born soldiers to boost their morale.

Nir Sela, executive director of the Association for the Soldiers of Israel – Canada, said Panim el Panim is one of a few dozen organizations in Israel that do similar work. "They are trying to build connections between people with different [political and religious] points of view."

The association is the largest charity in Israel and the only one authorized to work with the IDF, Sela said. "We try to help the soldiers with all their spiritual, educational and well-being needs."

Netivot holds 25th anniversary reunion

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Netivot HaTorah Day School will hold an alumni reunion in Toronto Feb. 22, as part of a series of events to celebrate the school's 25th anniversary. The Sunday evening reunion will be held at the school.

More than 100 people were expected to attend an earlier reunion last Friday at Neot Kedumim in Israel, where 25 trees were to be planted to mark the occasion. About 16 per cent of Netivot's almost 900 graduates have made aliyah, according to the school's director of development Alan Steinfeld.

Netivot's anniversary celebrations, including in-school programs for current students, will culminate with a gala dinner in Toronto May 25.

The coeducational Orthodox school runs from nursery to Grade 8, and held its first classes in September 1984 at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue. It has been in its own building in Thornhill since September 1993.

Of the 550 students currently at the school, at least four are children of alumni.

Rabbi Elliott Diamond, the school's Jewish studies vice-principal, said that some of the school's almost 900 graduates "have already started to evolve as leaders in communities.

"We are so pleased that over the last 25 years, 900 young men and women have been exposed to a vibrant and exciting vision of Orthodoxy," he said. "We are confident that the lessons they learned... will help them contribute to an unfolding future."

Further information about the reunion is available at www.netivot.com.

UNRWA piqued

Even UNRWA (United Nations Relief and Works Agency) officials, notoriously belligerent against Israel in the fulfilment of their duties as the world's public trustees, of sorts, on behalf of Palestinian "refugees" and only Palestinian "refugees," were sufficiently bothered with Hamas that they publicly announced last Friday they would temporarily suspend distribution of humanitarian aid throughout Gaza.

The agency made the announcement after Hamas, the day before, seized control of UNRWA warehouses, stole some 200 tons of food and supplies and 10 trucks in which the supplies were delivered. Earlier in the week, Hamas police officers stole thousands of blankets and food parcels from UNRWA meant for needy Gazans.

As of this writing, talks were being held between Hamas and UNRWA to resolve their respective differences.

UNRWA, it must be recalled, was established in the aftermath of the Arab-Israeli war of 1948 to provide education, health and social services to the Palestinian people. It remains, to this very day, the only UN agency that assists one single, regionally defined group of refugees. That third- and fourth-generation Palestinians living wherever they do should still be defined as "refugees" strains logic, common sense, decency and historical precedent. Far worse, however, it carves deep into the psyches of Palestinians and many other peoples (of the Middle East and further afield, too) a false but pitiable sense of Palestinian victimization. And thus it prolongs Palestinian misery.

The need to reform UNRWA was trumpeted last week by one of its own former top officials. In a report titled Fixing UNRWA: Repairing the UN's Troubled System of Aid to Palestinian Refugees, James Lindsay, a fellow at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, a former attorney with the U.S. Justice Department and then UNRWA's general counsel from 2002 until 2007, urged the agency to "halt its one-sided political statements and limit itself to comments on humanitarian issues: take additional steps to ensure the agency is not employing or providing benefits to terrorists and criminals; and allow the UN Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO), or some other neutral entity, to provide balanced and discrimination-free textbooks for UNRWA initiatives."

Lindsay also suggested that UNRWA services should be extended to individuals who truly need them and not to those who continue to claim them by virtue of their status as "refugee".

Not surprisingly, Andrew Whitley, director of the UNRWA in New York, criticized the report. "Someone reading this paper with no background," Whitely said, "would assume that the Israeli government was a benign actor. No mention is made of the occupation of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip."

With this quite revealing statement of rebuttal, Whitley proved Lindsay's case. It's our view that UNRWA should be disbanded and that aid should be distributed to the Palestinians in the way that other groups receive it from the UN. But reform of UNRWA along Lindsay's lines would be a good, second-best alternative.

Anti-Semitism at rallies

It should come as no shock to Canadian Jews that recent rallies across Canada and throughout the world in support of Hamas should contain vile and hateful comments about Jews in general and Israel in particular. Palestinian children are taught from the moment they are able to read that all Jews are their enemies and Palestinian maps still do not show the existence of the State of Israel. Saudi Arabia does not permit the presence of a synagogue or even to allow Jews to visit that country. The United Nations Human Rights Commission passes resolution after resolution branding Israel as a virtual criminal entity. It is, therefore, no wonder that we are witnessing a rise in overt anti-Semitism and anti-Israel rhetoric. Fortunately, Canada now unabashedly supports Israel's right to exist and condemns the expressions of hatred and intolerance. Truth and justice will prevail when all countries in the world are held to same standard being demanded of Israel.

Outraged, disappointed by CJN column

Please permit me to express my outrage and disappointment at Jesse Mintz's column, "Bombing Gaza university was a bad idea (CJN, Jan. 22).

He introduces his subject with the premise that the readers are aware of the issue and may have come down on either side of the equation, some believing that "Hamas is a terrorist organization," others that "Israel is an occupying power." For any fair-minded person who may be even remotely aware of the facts about Israel's experience with Hamas and Gaza, to weigh the two in the same balance is astonishing.

From this false start, he proceeds to "act according to his moral compass," and from all the myriad of subjects with regard to Israel's experience in Gaza, he decides to criticize Israel for bombing the Islamic University. He concludes that Israel's contention that it did so was because the university was "used as a storehouse for Hamas arms" is not true. He cites, as his proof, "many analysts" and "some writing for Ha'aretz."

He bemoans this terrible tragedy that Israel has wreaked on this august body of learning and its students. He refers to its 20,000 students and 10 faculties. Does he not wonder what was being taught there?

Letters to editors all over the world are inundated with criticisms of Israel, real and imagined. We, the readers of The CJN, expect a little better.

Sam Mitnick

Supporters give Israel uncritical reverence

Jack Kopyto says that The CJN "should reflect only the righteous side, which is Israel" ("CJN should reflect Israel's side only," CJN letters, Jan. 22). I presume he is aware that in Israel itself, there is a variety of views expressed in the media, the Knesset and the street. Not everyone in Israel regards the Israeli government or its actions in Gaza as "righteous." Why, then, should Jewish publications in Canada (or even general interest publications) be nothing more than uncritical cheering sections for the Israeli government?

It seems that many supporters of the Israeli government admire its democratic aspects in theory, but ignore them in practice, giving Israel uncritical reverence.

Orthodox conversion standards

It is not surprising that Rabbi Avi Shafran of the Agudath Israel of America fully supports the haredi rabbinate that controls the conversion process in Israel and, consequently, worldwide ("Orthodox cherish fellow Jews," CJN letters, Jan. 29). This haredi rabbinate has unfortunately imposed such exacting standards of conversion that it ultimately only embraces a very small percentage of non-Orthodox Jews and rejects many qualified and legitimate converts. Rabbi Shafran compares those who promulgate a less strict view of halachic conversion to those who espouse a less traditional, progressive and hence less scientific approach to medicine. This is in contrast with the haredim, whom Rabbi Shafran views as akin to the progenitors of mainstream medical thought and practice. A more apt comparison, however, would be that the haredi approach to conversion is like a doctor whose practice is restricted to the most compliant of patients, as opposed to a doctor who is open to the vast majority of ordinary folk seeking medical care and attention.

It is true that we need to enforce high and meaningful standards for conversion, but must they be as stringent as they have become under the haredi watch? Rabbi Marc Angel of the Institute for Jewish Ideas and Ideals, himself an Orthodox rabbi and scholar, said it best earlier this year: "The Halachah provides leeway and multiple views about the nature of the conversion process. Halachic Judaism should not be constricted to only one halachic view, and certainly not to the most rigid and restrictive view. It must be recognized that different legitimate halachic positions are available."

Did Daniel Pearl die in vain?

By JUDEA PEARL

Judea Pearl

This week marks the seventh anniversary of the murder of our son, former Wall Street Journal reporter Daniel Pearl. My wife Ruth and I wonder: would Danny have believed that today's world emerged after his tragedy?

The answer does not come easily. Danny was an optimist, a true believer in the goodness of mankind. Yet he was also a realist, and would not let idealism bend the harshness of facts.

Neither he, nor the millions who were shocked by his murder, could have possibly predicted that seven years later his abductor, Omar Saeed Sheikh, according to several South Asian reports, would be planning terror acts from the safety of a Pakistani jail. Or that his murderer, Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, now in Guantanamo, would proudly boast of his murder in a military tribunal in March 2007 to the cheers of sympathetic jihadi supporters. Or that this ideology of barbarism would be celebrated in European and American universities, fuelling rally after rally for Hamas, Hezbollah and other heroes of "the resistance." Or that another kidnapped young man, Israeli Gilad Schalit, would spend his 950th day of captivity with no Red Cross visitation while world leaders seriously debate whether his kidnappers deserve international recognition.

No. Those around the world who mourned for Danny in 2002 genuinely hoped that Danny's murder would be a turning point in the history of man's inhumanity to man, and that the targeting of innocents to transmit political messages would quickly become, like slavery and human sacrifice, an embarrassing relic of a bygone era.

But somehow, barbarism, often cloaked in the language of "resistance," has gained acceptance in the most elite circles of our society. The words "war on terror" cannot be uttered today without fear of offence. Civilized society, so it seems, is so numbed by violence that it has lost its gift to be disgusted by evil.

I believe it all started with well-meaning analysts, who in their zeal to find creative solutions to terror decided that terror is not a real enemy, but a tactic. Thus the basic engine that propels acts of terrorism – the ideological licence to elevate one's grievances above the norms of civilized society – was wished away in favour of seemingly more manageable "tactical" considerations.

Our luminaries must stop making excuses for terror, Pearl's father says

This mentality of surrender then worked its way through politicians like the former mayor of London, Ken Livingstone. In July 2005, he told Sky News that suicide bombing is almost man's second nature. "In an unfair balance, that's what people use," Livingstone explained.

But the clearest endorsement of terror as a legitimate instrument of political bargaining came from former U.S. president Jimmy Carter. In his book Palestine: Peace Not Apartheid, Carter appeals to the sponsors of suicide bombing. "It is imperative that the general Arab community and all significant Palestinian groups make it clear that they will end the suicide bombings and other acts of terrorism when international laws and the ultimate goals of the [internationally sponsored 'road map' peace plan] are accepted by Israel." Acts of terror, according to Carter, are no longer taboo, but effective tools for terrorists to address perceived injustices.

Carter's logic has become the dominant paradigm in rationalizing terror. When asked what Israel should do to stop Hamas' rockets aimed at innocent civilians, the Syrian first lady, Asma Assad, did not hesitate for a moment in her response: "They should end the occupation." In other words, terror must earn a dividend before it is stopped.

The media have played a major role in handing terrorism this victory of acceptability. Qatari-based Al Jazeera television, for example, is still providing Sheikh Yusuf Al-Qaradawi hours of free air time each week to spew his hateful interpretation of the Qur'an, authorize suicide bombing, and call for jihad against Jews and Americans.

Then came the August 2008 birthday of Samir Kuntar, the unrepentant killer who, in 1979, smashed the head of a four-year-old Israeli girl with his rifle after killing her father before her eyes. Al Jazeera elevated Kuntar to heroic heights with orchestras, fireworks and sword dances, presenting him to 50 million viewers as Arab society's role model. No mainstream western media outlet dared to expose Al Jazeera's efforts to warp its young viewers into the likes of Kuntar. Al Jazeera's management continues to receive royal treatment in all major press clubs.

Some American pundits and TV anchors didn't seem much different from Al Jazeera in their analysis of the recent war in Gaza. Bill Moyers was quick to lend Hamas legitimacy as a "resistance" movement, together with honorary membership in PBS's imaginary "cycle of violence." In his Jan. 9 TV show, Moyers explained to his viewers that "each [side] greases the cycle of violence, as one man's terrorism becomes another's resistance to oppression." He then stated – without blushing – that for readers of the Hebrew Bible, "God-soaked violence became genetically coded." The "cycle of violence" platitude allows analysts to empower terror with the guise of reciprocity, and, amazingly, indict terror's victims for violence as immutable as DNA.

Daniel Pearl

When we ask ourselves what it is about the American psyche that enables genocidal organizations such as Hamas – the charter of which would offend every neuron in our brains – to become tolerated in public discourse, we should take a hard look at our universities and the way they are currently being manipulated by terrorist sympathizers.

At my own university, UCLA, a recent symposium on human rights turned into a Hamas recruitment rally by a clever academic gimmick. The director of the Center for Near East Studies carefully selected only Israel bashers for the panel, each of whom concluded that the Jewish state is the greatest criminal in human history.

The primary purpose of the event was evident the morning after, when unsuspecting, uninvolved students read an article in the campus newspaper titled, "Scholars say: Israel is in violation of human rights in Gaza," to which the good name of the University of California was attached. This is where Hamas scored its main triumph – another inch of academic respectability, another inroad into western minds.

Danny's picture is hanging just in front of me, his warm smile as reassuring as ever. But I find it hard to look him straight in the eyes and say: "You did not die in vain."

On specious comparisons

We make comparisons all the time. But not all things are comparable. Lately, I have wondered why so many people glibly compare Israel or Israeli fighters to Nazis. How is it that they seem to know so much about the experience of the Jews during the war? How is it that some Holocaust deniers now seem to be able to use the Holocaust when it suits them to cast the first stone? How is it that they dare besmirch the memory of so many without knowing the reality, then or now?

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

What is comparable in the current situation?

Israel left Gaza, leaving the land to the Palestinians. Did the Nazis leave Jews land with housing and farms? Hamas has been raining rockets on Israeli towns for more than seven years. Who is Nazi-like in this picture? Those who attack civilians steadily, without cause, simply because they're Jewish?

Israel waited with great patience, then acted in self defence. Again we ask: how is this comparable? Were the Nazis acting in self defence against the Jews, or are nations upset that Jews finally have an army with which to defend themselves? Is that where the foul comparison comes from?

Are we faced with an aggressive verbal assault to cover up the shame of loss? Too many Palestinians have died. That is tragic, but who is to blame? This is the crux of the ridiculous disproportionality claim. Israel was successful in defending and protecting its people. It built shelters and an early warning system so that the rockets from Gaza were not mass killers. Hamas did no such thing. Instead of shelters, they hid rocket launchers in schools and hospitals, guaranteeing loss of life. Who is to blame for the deadly imbalance? Hamas. And Israel should be credited with the many lives saved on both sides of the conflict.

So who is Nazi-like?

Think, dear friends, when so many cry that human rights are being violated, think of their comparisons. Many human rights are being violated, but the culprits aren't Israelis. Hamas and its supporters have violated everyone's rights, but most seriously those of their own people. Just recently, we saw videos of Hamas agents torturing and killing Fatah soldiers. How come none of our liberal friends who take out ads criticizing Israel and comparing it to Nazis spoke out once against such atrocities? Where are their voices?

Where were their voices when Jews were terrorized and expelled from Arab lands?

And what does Hamas want in the end? No Israel, and no Jews in the region!

What was the Nazis' goal? That Europe would be Judenrein.

So who are the modern-day Nazis? Make the comparison.

What the Pope is really up to

With the recent announcement that Pope Benedict has reinstated four bishops who had been excommunicated as schismatic, we have entered a new phase of Jewish-Catholic relationships, and not a good one.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

It's not the place of a non-Catholic to take issue with what Catholics find heretical. What should give pause is the reinstatement of Holocaust denier Bishop Richard Williamson.

Equally disturbing are the pallid responses of Jewish civil servants to this latest outrage against Jews.

ADL leader Abraham Foxman (in the New York Times, on Jan. 25) wrote that this reinstatement "could provide succor to those whose views threaten the Jewish people and the church's desire to improve and deepen its relationship with us to benefit all mankind." Rabbi David Rosen of the International Jewish Committee for Interreligious Consultations (in the same source) called on the Vatican to "reiterate its unqualified repudiation and condemnation of… any Holocaust denial."

Israeli interfaith organizations and the rabbinate have written similar responses.

Well, that should certainly make a difference. Not.

The Pope's decision is in direct response to a letter sent by the Society of Pius X, which itself was founded in 1970 in opposition to, and in open conflict with, the liberalizing reforms of Vatican II that opened a meaningful dialogue between Jews and Catholics.

In a letter to Germany's 27 official bishops in October, the director of the society's German branch, Rev. Franz Schmidberger, wrote that Jews "are not 'our older brothers in faith.'" Instead, he wrote, "for as long as they do not distance themselves from their forefathers' guilt through the avowal of Christ's divinity and baptism, they are complicit in the deicide," according to a copy of the letter available on the society's website.

Pope Benedict himself has a totally different agenda for the church, and it certainly does not include making nice with the Jews. Foxman et al can write all the letters they want. Just get out of the Pope's way, because his train is not going down that track.

This latest incident is not the only indicator that the Pope plans to follow in the footsteps of his illustrious predecessor: the late (and not by us lamented) Pope Pius XII – who, by the way, Benedict recently set on the road to sainthood. This is the man whom author John Cornwell calls "Hitler's Pope." Pius XII, in turn, followed Pius X's anti-modernizing program for the Church.

But he was much worse. As Hitler began his campaign of genocide, Pius XII stepped out of the way in return for hegemony over the Church hierarchy, signing a pact with Hitler that in effect withdrew the Church from denouncing the war against the Jews.

If this chain seems tenuous, it's not. There's a clear connection between Pius X, XII, and Benedict. Their goal: to assure the supremacy of the papacy, and to oppose any acknowledgement of the validity of other faiths, and certainly any of the reforms derived from Vatican II.

That includes detente with the Jews, who, in any case, face eternal damnation, since there is no salvation outside the Church. That's another tenet of the present pope, who has written much on how the other Christian denominations – never mind Jews and Muslims – rate lower in the scale of salvation.

Hitler's Pope: the Secret History of Pius XII, by Cornwell, documents the way Pius XII manoeuvred to remove resistance to Hitler by Church officials, many of whom were appalled by Nazi Germany.

Why? Because control of doctrine and the vast engine of the Church were Pius' goals. Those same goals, through a smaller but doctrinally pure Catholic Church, are also the goals of Benedict.

The victims in this are those Catholics who want to remain in the Church yet want it to embrace a wider spectrum of faith, while at the same time maintaining the spiritual strength that the Catholic faith offers them.

It's not our job to tell the church what to do. But having been the victims of its disregard of atrocity once, we can only watch as it prepares to eat its own, or at least to turn them away, as it were, at the door of the cathedral.

Hatred at home

Reflect back in time to 2001 and the fiasco in Durban, South Africa, where the United Nations convened the World Conference Against Racism to address the systemic issues of racism in many parts of the modern world.

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

With meticulous planning, the Palestinian "lobby" used this forum as a means of attacking and vilifying Israel under the guise of a world conference that should have had little to do with Middle Eastern politics.

Those who attended the preparatory committee meetings earlier that year in Geneva and elsewhere saw the writing on the wall – Durban was going to be exploited by hostile forces to lash out at Israel. But no one expected Durban to become the site of what turned out to be rampant anti-Semitism.

As seen too often throughout history, various calamities, including the bubonic plague, have been blamed on and turned into attacks against Jews.

In Durban, there were anti-Semitic signs and pamphlets, and there were demonstrations at which banners and T-shirts displayed images of swastikas and even Hitler's face. There were threats of physical violence, and the Jews who were attending the conference in search of dialogue and solutions to fight racism became the victims of hate. And on it went.

Many in attendance commented that never since the dark days of Nazi Germany had there been such unparallelled, systematic displays of open propaganda against Jews. The threats and incitement to hate were so pronounced that, had they occurred in Canada, they would have violated the hate propaganda provisions of our Criminal Code. They probably also violated South African laws, however, since the conference occurred on property temporarily designated as falling under the jurisdiction of the United Nations, nothing was done about it.

Fast forward to Canada in 2009 and the pro-Hamas, anti-Israel demonstrations in Montreal (on Jan. 4 and 10) and Toronto (on Jan. 10) occurring as a result of the Hamas-initiated fighting in Gaza. These displays quickly became ugly, exhibitions of anti-Semitism. These examples of anti-Jewish hatred were widely reported, and a number of YouTube videos captured demonstrators shouting chilling threats against Jews ("Jews are our dogs!" and "Jewish child… you're gonna f'n die. Hamas is coming for you!").

We know from recent international reports that such expressions of hate can lead to actual violence. This recently occurred in both London and Antwerp.

Canada is a nation that encourages freedom of speech, freedom of assembly and freedom of association. These are constitutionally protected rights in Section 2 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. We recognize that dissent is part of the Canadian experience, and the Charter permits peaceful assembly and encourages legitimate expressions of protest.

But the anti-Israel protests turned into ugly exhibitions of hate against Jews. It was shocking to witness this kind of thing in South Africa, but we certainly do not expect to experience this in our Canadian cities.

Who spoke out against these protests against Israel that became shameful, raw, anti-Jewish attacks?

To his credit, at least one prominent politician did so. On Jan. 15, Jason Kenny, the minister of Citizenship, Immigration and Multiculturalism, stated, in part, that "the open incitement of hatred has absolutely no place in Canadian society." There were also editorials to that effect in the Montreal Gazette, the Chronicle Herald and the Ottawa Citizen. But most of Canada was silent.

The Middle Eastern conflict should never become a reason to incite hatred against Jews. We all assume, perhaps incorrectly, that all Canadians, irrespective of their backgrounds, would not succumb to the vicious and hateful expressions of anti-Semitism that characterized these protests in our cities.

Canada is a civilized nation, respecting people's right to hold varied opinions. But we must draw the line when legitimate expression becomes displays of criminal hatred.

The United Nations is planning a followup conference "against" racism later this year in Geneva at an event commonly referred to as "Durban II." There are already many signs suggesting that the conference will, once again, primarily focus upon the Middle East conflict and evolve into another anti-Semitic forum. Fortunately, Canada has had the good sense not to participate. One Durban was certainly enough.

We must be vigilant against anti-Jewish and all other forms of hatred in Canada and must speak out strongly whenever and wherever they occur.

The Kirshner File

War underscored divisions among Palestinians

The recent three-week war in the Gaza Strip was a showcase for bitter Palestinian rivalries and a reminder that efforts to defuse the internecine warfare among Palestinian factions have failed miserably.

As Israel and Hamas fought a series of battles that ended with an uneasy truce last month, Hamas and its rival, Fatah, squabbled openly and demonstrably, pushing back the already dim chances for Palestinian reconciliation and unity. Yet long before the Gaza war broke out, Fatah, secular nationalist in orientation, and Hamas, steeped in Islamic piety, were deeply at odds.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Fatah, having recognized Israel, has negotiated with the Jewish state and supports a two-state solution to resolve the Arab-Israeli conflict. Hamas, having rejected Israel's very existence, calls for an Islamic state in its place.

This past December, Fatah urged Hamas to renew the six-month ceasefire along Gaza's border with Israel, but Hamas archly ignored the plea, thereby touching off the war.

As well, Fatah and Hamas cannot agree on the nature of a future Palestinian state. Should it be built on the foundations of secularism or Islamic fundamentalism?

A fourth contentious issue turns on power. Should the Palestinian Authority – an organ controlled by Fatah and backed by Israel, the United States and the European Union – be the sole, legitimate representative of the Palestinian people? Or should Hamas, supported by Iran and Syria, be in charge?

The Palestinians are also at loggerheads over which faction should control the Rafah border crossing adjacent to Egypt. With Israel's unilateral withdrawal from Gaza in 2005, the Rafah terminal was administered by the Palestinian Authority and European Union monitors, but this arrangement fell by the wayside, and today, Hamas wants a role in its operation.

These contentious issues assumed greater prominence and stoked still more tension after Hamas won the parliamentary elections in the Palestinian territories in January 2006 on a platform of reform and change. With Hamas' victory at the polls, Israel imposed a blockade on Gaza – a Hamas stronghold – in an attempt to undermine the Islamic regime. The Israeli government also convinced the United States, Canada and the European Union that the siege should remain in place until Hamas recognized Israel, renounced terrorism and accepted previous agreements entered into by Israel and the Palestinian Authority.

Meanwhile, the security forces of Fatah and Hamas engaged in periodic armed clashes, particularly in Gaza. Early in 2007, Saudi Arabia intervened, inviting Fatah and Hamas representatives to meet for reconciliation talks in the city of Mecca. The purpose of the negotiations was two-fold: to stop the intermittent fighting and end Israel's blockade.

The two sides finally signed a power-sharing accord – the Mecca Agreement – in February 2007, under which Fatah's Mahmoud Abbas retained the presidency of the Palestinian Authority and Hamas' Ismail Haniyeh was named prime minister of the national unity government. Israel was disappointed by the outcome, Abbas having failed to convince Haniyeh to recognize Israel or give up violence. Hamas, however, expressed "respect" for agreements that Israel and the Palestinian Authority had signed.

To no one's surprise, the shelf life of the two-headed Palestinian government was of brief duration. Tensions escalated, climaxing with a full-blown civil war in which Hamas seized Gaza in June 2007. Appalled by Hamas' rout of Fatah, Israel tightened the blockade of Gaza, an impoverished enclave with 1.5 million inhabitants, many of them refugees.

Egypt, playing the role of honest broker, tried to defuse the power struggle by tabling a set of proposals. A new Palestinian government, consisting solely of politically independent figures, would be established. The Palestinian security forces would be restructured. Hamas would rescind its takeover of Gaza. Fresh presidential and parliamentary elections would be held in Gaza and the West Bank.

Yet even as these sweeping proposals were discussed, Hamas announced it would not recognize Abbas as president of the Palestinian Authority after his five-year term of office expired on Jan. 9, 2009.

With the impasse deepening and Fatah and Hamas blaming each other for the failure of Egypt's mediation efforts, the Egyptians threw up their hands in despair, suggesting that the Fatah-Hamas split was morphing into a permanent phenomenon. By the autumn of 2008, it was reported, many young Palestinian men in the West Bank affiliated with Hamas had begun to shave their beards out of fear of being arrested by Fatah police.

Shortly afterward, following Hamas' refusal to extend the shaky truce and its shelling of Israeli communities near the border, Israel uncorked Operation Cast Lead.

In response, Abbas pointed a finger of guilt at Hamas, blaming its leaders for having provoked Israel with "acts of foolishness."

As Israel escalated its offensive in Gaza and Hamas called for a third intifadah, the Palestinian Authority banned protesters in West Bank towns from expressing solidarity with Hamas by hoisting its flag, chanting pro-Hamas slogans or marching toward Israeli army checkpoints and Jewish settlements. In one instance, Palestinian police used tear gas to break up a demonstration. As part of its crackdown, Fatah rounded up hundreds of Hamas supporters, including a number of journalists. These measures were reportedly carried out in co-ordination with Israel.

On a rhetorical level, the Palestinian Authority stepped up its verbal attacks on Hamas. Tayeb Abdel Rahim, a senior aide to Abbas, charged Hamas with holding the Palestinians in Gaza hostage and exploiting "the Israeli massacres against our people to strengthen its position." Yasser Abed Rabbo, another senior Fatah official, accused Hamas of seeking to create an "emirate of darkness" in Gaza and permanently separate Gaza from the West Bank. Still other Fatah officials said that supporters in Gaza had been detained, kneecapped and murdered.

Once Israel expanded its military operation with a ground invasion of Gaza, Abbas shifted course, lashing out at Israel. He denounced Israel's action as "barbaric and criminal," called for an immediate ceasefire, claimed Israel had no interest in peace and threatened to pull out of peace talks with Israel.

Even as he excoriated Israel, Abbas declined to suspend the Palestinian Authority's security co-operation with Jerusalem.

Once the war wound down, Hamas' top official in Syria, Khaled Meshal – the object of an Israeli assassination attempt in 1997 – claimed that the Palestine Liberation Organization, controlled by Fatah, had deepened "divisions" in Palestinian ranks. In a bombshell, he declared that the Palestinians required a brand new leadership. Meshal's schismatic statement won the support of such radical Syrian-based Palestinian groups as Islamic Jihad and the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine-General Command.

The Palestinian Authority was livid, saying that Iran and Syria had encouraged Hamas to challenge its leadership. Since then, Abbas has ruled out further reconciliation talks with Hamas unless it accepts the supremacy of the PLO. Adopting a cooler approach, Egypt has proposed a renewal of such negotiations later this month.

There have been suggestions that the war strengthened Hamas – which fought back, never surrendered and continued firing missiles at Israel until the last day – and weakened Fatah, which, critics said, was essentially in league with Israel and did not do nearly enough to stop the carnage in Gaza. This analysis may prove to be correct one day, but for now, Fatah and Hamas are still bitterly vying for dominance and for the hearts and minds of Palestinians.

Women's brain health focus of Baycrest fund

By RITA POLIAKOV
Special to The CJN

Seventy per cent of those who suffer from Alzheimer's disease are female, according to new statistics released by the Alzheimer Society of Canada.

It was this news that sparked the campaign recently launched by Women of Baycrest to fund research into Alzheimer's that will focus primarily on women's brain health.

"I wanted to create an annual campaign that would be unique, [a campaign] where money would go towards funding research," said Lynn Posluns, the campaign co-chair. "It's a given fact that women are the primary caregivers. We have to keep ourselves healthy. If we can focus fundraising on brain health, it will benefit our daughters and granddaughters."

Women of Baycrest is a network of women who run an annual fundraising campaign to support new initiatives in women's health and aging and women brain scientists, and ensure that research is relevant and sensitive to women's brain health concerns. Alzheimer's, the most common form of dementia, is a progressive neurological disease.

Baycrest, which focuses on health sciences and cares for aging adults, has set a goal of $3 million for this campaign. Women can join by buying a membership, which costs $1,800. The money will eventually fund a new research chair in women's brain health at the centre.

The current campaign, officially launched on Jan. 28, supports Dr. Tiffany Chow, a clinician-scientist at the Rotman Research Institute and staff behavioural neurologist at Baycrest's Brain Health Centre Memory Disorders Clinic. The funds will be used to hire a post-doctoral fellow to work with Chow on Alzheimer's research.

"I think the group here is very keen on things that are impacting women more than men," Chow said at the campaign launch.

"We need fresh ideas," she added. "One clue into why the disease targets woman may be the mitochondria.

"Every cell in your body has mitochondria, which are like energy batteries. If they're not working well, the cell will die."

Chow said the DNA that forms mitochondria comes from the mother, a fact that may be related to the question of why women are more vulnerable to Alzheimer's.

"The findings can have some really huge ripples across neuro-degenerative disorders… Everyone's afraid of them. Right now, we can say, 'We understand what you have,' but we don't have anything that stops the progression."

Organizing the campaign only took about six weeks. Posluns, along with co-chair Rhonda Litwack, secured sponsors including the Globe and Mail, HMV and Dermalogica. Some 150 guests attended the launch, which cost $75 for members and $95 for non-members. So far, the campaign has more than 100 people committed to membership.

"I move quickly," Posluns said. "The more we talk to women… the more you hear, 'Yes, do it.' One reason is, a great group of people got on board quickly. It started to have momentum on its own."

For Charlotte Tessis, 58, who has been involved with Baycrest since her teen years, this campaign is an important one.

"I was a candystriper at Baycrest as a teen. Baycrest was good to my grandparents, my parents," she said at the launch. "Women should care [about this campaign] because they're women."

When Tessis, a past fundraising co-chair, first heard of the initiative, she was on board, as was her husband.

"I told my husband, 'I'm going to become a member.' When I told him, he said, 'Why wouldn't you? It's a natural thing, of course you would.' There was nothing to discuss," she said.

Report sexual abuse of kids, panel urges

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

When religiously observant girls learn to dress modestly to avoid tempting "boys who have no control over their animal behaviour," and they end up being sexually abused, they may feel partially responsible, according to Judy Klitsner, one of three speakers at a recent Torah in Motion event.

The Jan. 15 panel discussion at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation addressed "Keeping Our Children Safe: What Families and Communities Can Do." A senior lecturer at the Pardes Institute of Jewish Studies, Klitsner has written in the New York Jewish Week about being abused as a teenager by Rabbi Baruch Lanner when he headed the National Conference of Synagogue Youth.

Modesty, or tzniut, applies to vocabulary as much as to skirt length, said Michelle Friedman, a New York psychiatrist and assistant professor of psychiatry who also teaches pastoral counseling to rabbinical students at Yeshivat Chovevei Torah.

"If girls don't even know some of the terms for their own body parts, you feel like you're not supposed to know those words and you're not supposed to talk about it."

Rabbi Mark Dratch, founder of West Hempstead, N.Y.-based Jsafe: The Jewish Institute Supporting an Abuse-Free Environment and a former spiritual leader of Shaarei Shomayim, was unequivocal in urging people to talk about sexual abuse and report it after it has occurred.

"Let it be said very clearly, when there's a positive purpose for which the information is shared, it's not prohibited speech. It's mandated speech."

In the Orthodox community, victims of sexual abuse are often concerned that if it becomes known that there has been abuse in the family, there will be a negative impact on shidduchim (marriage matches), Rabbi Dratch said.

"I would much rather have my child marry someone who had dealt with abuse in a responsible way than have dysfunction because abuse was not dealt with. I hope I'm not in the minority."

Silence is the oxygen of abuse, Klitsner stressed.

When she was 16, Rabbi Lanner attempted to strangle her after she rebuffed his advances and threatened to report him, she said.

In 2002, the New York Jewish Week reported that Rabbi Lanner had been sentenced to seven years in prison for sexually abusing two teenage girls in the early 1990s.

Klitsner didn't tell anyone what had happened to her, she said. "I was convinced that [Rabbi Lanner] was the king, and in his kingdom, everybody played by his rules."

She said she feared confronting him and feared that he was capable of doing or saying anything, and she also felt confused and guilty.

"My father was ill. My mother was busy with that, and [Rabbi Lanner] counted on the fact that I wouldn't want to involve them."

The worst part of abuse by a spiritual leader is the psychological and spiritual component, Klitsner said. "I've seen it in every denomination of Judaism, and in every branch of Orthodoxy. It's not worse in Orthodoxy, but it's not better, either."

The overwhelming majority of abuse accusations are true, Rabbi Dratch said.

But Klitsner said that rabbis often protect an abusive colleague, rationalizing that he "must have done tshuvah," that "some 14-year-olds are very mature," or saying, "Look at all the good he does... We can't afford to lose him.'

"I hope it's obvious this is unacceptable," she said.

Even worse, Klitsner added, is the attitude that if there was no physical assault, then "nothing happened."

The rabbi believes the rate of sexual abuse in the Jewish community is no different than it is in the larger community. He said that in the United States, one of every three or four women has been a victim of such abuse in her lifetime.

He said he would not want to ban physical touch between teachers and students of the same gender, as long as it is responsible and appropriate.

"When a student feels uncomfortable, it is clearly inappropriate." Also, he added, any touching "needs to be in public" with other people around.

He also suggested, as a matter of protocol, that rabbis and teachers should never be alone with a child.

Instead of a windowless office for a rabbi, Rabbi Dratch suggested that a window with a screen would provide confidentiality and be "in everybody's interest."

Friedman said it's important to teach children to tell a trusted adult if touching feels uncomfortable.

"Somebody can touch your cheek in a way that feels uncomfortable," she noted, adding that a hug can sometimes feel right.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

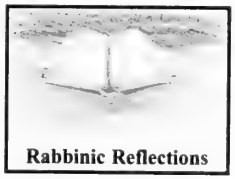
What role does the rabbi play?

By RABBI CHAIM YOSEF ACKERMAN

Our Torah portion this week, Parshat Yitro, recounts how Moses' father-in-law brought offerings to God, joining Moses, Aaron, and the Elders in sitting down to dine "in front of God" (Exodus 18:12).



On this, the Talmud (Brachot 64a) quotes Rabbi Avin HaLevi as saying that this proves that anyone who partakes of a banquet at which a Torah scholar dines is considered as though they had enjoyed the Divine Presence itself.

While Nachmanides and Rabbi Ovadia Seforno say that this meal's purpose was to celebrate the conversion of Yitro, and that the meal was partially made up of the Shelamim offering that had been brought for the occasion, the Talmud feels that these reasons are not sufficient to be deemed "in front of Hashem," and only having Torah scholars present would suffice.

To further compound the issue, the situation was such that the participants had not even contributed anything to the Torah scholars, but rather had just partaken of a meal, a purely physical act devoid of any apparent spirituality.

The Talmud must be telling us of the effect that our association with the Torah's wisest can have upon us, and how closely related that is to our being around God Himself.

Obviously, a rabbi is not simply for ornamental purposes, or to round out a life-cycle event with the right sayings.

Yet if just spending time with our leaders provides spiritual uplifting, how much more can we gain by cultivating a meaningful relationship with them? The rabbi is to be a central figure in the Jewish home, helping young and old identify with their yiddishkeit, and, ultimately, with Hashem.

Rabbi Chaim Yosef Ackerman is assistant rabbi of Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation.

Tikkun olam, Part 1

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

"Tikkun olam" is probably one of the resilient phrases in Jewish thought. Over the course of almost two millennia, it has been used in the context of everything from halachic law and mystical thought to the drive for universal social justice. Some people are enamoured with this phrase since it is so adaptable to modern needs. Critics argue that it is being bent out of shape to encompass almost any goal in mind. Today, a look at tikkun olam.

The phrase goes back almost 2,000 years and was used in the Mishnah when describing the rules for proper conduct between a divorcing husband and wife, the obligations for taking an oath or the rules for ransoming captives. In all cases, the expression used is mipnei tikkun ha'olam (literally, "for the sake of repairing the world" – or colloquially, "in the public interest"). [tinyurl.com/tikkun05]

Now jump ahead a few centuries to 16th-century Safed, in the mountains of Galilee, and mystic Rabbi Isaac Luria who explained the role of prayer and mitzvot in tikkun olam. Although kabbalistic teachings are difficult to summarize in a couple of sentences, here is how Lurianic Kabbalah is explained at the Wikipedia site. "According to this vision of the world, God contracted part of God's self into vessels of light to create the world. These vessels shattered and their shards became sparks of light trapped within the material of creation. Prayer, especially contemplation of various aspects of the divinity (sephirot), releases these sparks and allows them to reunite with God's essence." [tinyurl.com/tikkun10]

The phrase continued to display its endurance in the 20th century when tikkun olam began to take on a meaning that includes social responsibility for the world at large. The use of the phrase even outside Jewish circles is partly due to the establishment in 1986 of Tikkun Magazine, whose masthead reads "to heal, repair, and transform the world." The magazine's goals include "interdependence and ecological sanity," "supporting the struggles for social justice and peace," and "peace, justice and reconciliation for Israel and Palestine." The magazine's website carries Tikkun's 12,000-word Core Vision. [tinyurl.com/tikkun08]

Not everyone is pleased by the current multiplicity of meanings for tikkun olam. Writing in the Jewish Press, the University of Haifa's Steven Plaut delivers a stinging rebuke. "Tikkun olam, the 'correcting' of the universe, has little if anything to do with things like social inequality, environmental cleanliness, and distribution of wealth and jobs... tikkun olam is mentioned in a major place in the Aleinu prayer that closes all prayer sessions, but again it is in conjunction with the wish to see idolatry and paganism erased from the earth. There is no mention of 'social justice' or environmentalist issues, no gun control proposals and no AIDS marches." [tinyurl.com/tikkun11] (More on the debate over the limits of tikkun olam next week.)

Since the web is more than just text, I was curious to see how people express tikkun olam visually. When you plug the words into the search engine at flickr.com, you get more than 1,000 photos, including images of kiddush cups, flowers, tzedakah programs and beach clean-ups, along with some other images that I must admit I have difficulty associating with tikkun olam. [tinyurl.com/tikkun06]

Over at YouTube, there is an assortment of tikkun olam-related videos [tinyurl.com/tikkun15] including one that illustrates how the State of Israel has risen to the challenge by dedicating resources for international humanitarian missions, among them, assisting Mexican earthquake survivors (1985) and Albanian refugees (1999) and researching the spread and treatment of malaria in Anglola (1996). [tinyurl.com/tikkun14]

The phrase may date back to the Mishnah, but the phrase tikkun olam is as famous as last week's newscast. Or at least, last June. That's when then-presumptive Democratic presidential nominee Barack Obama stood before the American Israel Public Affairs Committee. "As any Israeli will tell you, Israel is not a perfect place. But like the United States, it sets an example for all when it seeks a more perfect future. These same qualities can be found among American Jews. It is why so many Jewish-Americans have stood by Israel while advancing the American story, because there is a commitment embedded in the Jewish faith and tradition to freedom, to fairness, to social justice and equal opportunity. To tikkun olam, the obligation to repair this world." [tinyurl.com/tikkun03]

The moral fitness to lead

Money Matters

By Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

Our sages, ever so perceptive of human nature, note that a person reveals his true self through his "pocket, his drink and his anger" ("b'kiso, koso, kaaso"). The sudden turn in the economy allow us to take stock of the connection between our financial challenges and our moral fortitude. The Talmud defines a Jew as one who is merciful, self-effacing and benevolent. That these traits still permeate our community can be seen by the many who have stepped forward to fill charity voids left by others.

However, evidence of the moral malaise that is at the root of the economic crisis abounds. How sad to read how the former CEO of Merrill Lynch John Thain gave early authorization to the payment of bonuses totalling $4 billion (US) just before his firm was acquired by Bank of America.

Why a company that lost upwards of $15 billon in the quarter was paying any bonuses (and doing so in an underhanded fashion) is a question that should leave us morally shaken. But Bank of America appears to be a good partner for Merrill, possessing as it does a similar corporate culture. ABC News reported that the bank, which has happily accepted billions in federal taxpayer bailout dollars, spent more than $10 million sponsoring a Super Bowl party.

The list of such obscene corporate expenditures seems never-ending. While there are always those ready to explain the necessity of such spending, and some of the points may even have some validity, the overall environment is one of personal entitlement with little regard for the consequences or the context of such spending. Such lack of broader context helps explain the ever-widening salary gaps between top-level executives and the average worker on the job. While once again, such a gap can be explained by market forces, which in of themselves are not immoral, the overall impact of such increasingly wide discrepancies are unhealthy for all.

Our tradition has long recognized that our actions may be technically legal, yet morally deficient. In many a case, the hands of the court are powerless to act against those who are "exempt from the laws of man, yet liable in the eyes of Heaven." The aggressiveness of the financial industry in granting credit where it should not have is just one of many current examples of this idea.

Such moral failings of the corporate world, while regrettable, are not surprising. They're a manifestation of the rabbinic teachings that "jealousy, lust and honour drive a person from this world." It is thus up to the government and regulators to try to enact legislation to attempt to close the gap between the legal and the ethical.

Unfortunately, the prognosis is not promising.

Judaism has always demanded that only those who have the best interests of the community at heart, even at personal loss, are fit for leadership. Enacting legislation whose main goal is to help those in power to get re-elected doesn't qualify. Whatever one may think of the most recent Canadian budget, almost all analysts see it as serving political rather than economic ends.

Much more frightening is the current wave of protectionism coming out of Washington. It's hard to fathom (actually, maybe it's not so hard) why the leaders of the free world would want to enact legislation similar to that which helped cause the Great Depression. When leaders want to be seen as doing something and pander to the masses, whose grasp of economic theory is next to non-existent, long-term thinking is neglected with potentially dire consequences. Let us pray that our leaders rise to the challenges before them.

Finally, a leader to look up to

Ideas on Identity

By Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

I'm in love, and just in time for Valentine's Day. (Yes, I know. Valentine's Day isn't a Jewish holiday. That's for another column some time.) I am infatuated with Barack and Michelle Obama. I simply love the American first couple.

Don't worry. This isn't a crush or romantic love. And it's not a rose-coloured- glasses, political kind of love. I'm not sure how Obama's first 100 days as U.S. president will go. I'm not sure if all his appointments have been good ones. I certainly didn't love Pastor Rick Warren's evangelical invocation at the inauguration. His appropriating, triumphalist use of the Hebrew name of Jesus left me hopping mad and practically spoiled the whole inauguration for me.

I know that Obama faces a long, slogging road, and that he's just a man.

What I am in love with is the idea of Obama, the image of Obama. I love that my kids are growing up with a real "American hero," that other than rock stars and sports figures (often fallen sports figures, and questionably talented drug-using rock stars, unfortunately), today's young people now have a politician they can actually look up to.

If you had asked any preteen kid last year for a list of their heroes, I doubt that any world leader, from any country at all, would have topped the list. (Can most 12-year-olds even name their MP, MPP, MLA or MNA? Their provincial premier? The prime minister even? Try Disney's most recently invented rock group and you may do better.)

Recent scandals in the Israeli government revealed behaviour and attitudes that I certainly wouldn't want my kids to emulate. Canadian politicians are slightly ahead in this area, I admit proudly. But mostly we roll our eyes or even laugh at the foibles of elected officials. Occasionally, we're downright embarrassed by them.

And yes, I know Obama occasionally smokes. (Oy, Barack! Quit it already.) But what I see when I turn on the TV is an articulate, calm, dedicated leader with commitment, vision, open-mindedness, zeal, perseverance and a lovely family to whom he is loyal and caring, at least so far.

He seems to be an old-fashioned family man. He seems to really love and enjoy his family. I enjoy watching him with them. They seem downright wholesome. (Oy, Barack! Don't make a mistake on this one. Don't make me eat my words some day.)

Maybe I am naive, but I just don't get how people in the public eye – teachers, politicians and rabbis, too – can ever consider any behaviour that would jeopardize the faith the public has put in them.

The mantle of leadership may be heavy, but you choose to wear it.

My guess is that Obama understands this better than many politicians who have come before him. My guess is that as the first black president, he feels that the world is watching, and waiting for a fatal misstep.

He feels the weight of that mantle, and he doesn't dismiss it for a moment. So far.

OK, so far I'm in love.

Globe story sets record straight on incident in Gaza

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Patrick Martin's Jan. 29 Globe and Mail report, "Account of Israeli attack doesn't hold up to scrutiny," has attracted a lot of attention, because it reveals what journalism does at its best when it investigates and establishes the truth.

Martin wrote: "Most people remember the headlines: Massacre Of Innocents As UN School Is Shelled; Israeli Strike Kills Dozens At UN School." But "[t]here was just one problem: The story, as etched in people's minds, was not quite accurate."

Martin visited the school and determined, by examining the physical evidence and interviewing eyewitnesses, that reports of Israel striking it on Jan. 6 were wrong.

Martin wrote: "While a few people were injured from shrapnel landing inside the white-and-blue-walled UNRWA [United Nations Relief and Works Agency] compound, no one in the compound was killed. The 43 people who died in the incident were all outside, on the street, where all three mortar shells landed."

However, not all reports at the time of the tragic incident got it wrong.

In fact, on Jan. 6, the United Nations news service published a statement acknowledging that, according to John Ging, UNRWA's director of operations in Gaza, "three [Israeli] artillery shells landed at the perimeter of a school."

Confusion ensued when, in the same statement, United Nations Secretary-General Ban Ki-Moon, apparently ignoring or unaware of Ging's evaluation, condemned Israel's attack on the school.

Media outlets that, it seems, paid attention to Ging's account got the story right from the start. For example, on CBC's the National (Jan. 6) anchor Peter Mansbridge said that Israeli shells exploded "by" the school, not on it.

Similarly, on Jan. 6, Global TV News reporter Lauren McNabb said that Israeli tank shells exploded "outside" the UN school. However, viewers might well have been confused by anchor Kevin Newman's introductory remark that the school "has been bombed by Israeli forces."

The National Post got it wrong by relying on a Reuters news service story, "Israel Defends Shelling Schools; Accuses Hamas of using civilians as 'bulletproof vests,'" (Jan. 7). Reporting that three UN-run schools were hit by Israeli fire, Reuters was apparently relying on an initial Israeli Defence Forces (IDF) statement that it had responded to Hamas' fire from inside the school. (It was later determined that Hamas fired from near the school.)

In "Israelis hit school, Ottawa blames Hamas" (Toronto Star, Jan. 7) Oakland Ross wrote that "at least 42 Palestinians – including children – were killed by Israeli tank fire while taking shelter in a UN-operated school."

Ross, too, relied on the initial Israeli report that said Hamas had fired from the school, and also on a statement from Foreign Affairs Minister Peter Kent implying that the school had been struck, but blaming Hamas.

Adding to the confusion, on Jan. 7 the Toronto Star also ran a piece by Associated Press reporters Ibrahim Barzak and Jason Keyser. The headline – "'There's nowhere safe in Gaza'; 42 dead, dozens injured as Israeli mortar shells explode near UN school in teeming refugee camp" – indicated that the Israeli shells did not hit the school itself.

Apparently relying on both Ban Ki-Moon's statement and the initial IDF explanation, even Patrick Martin, in his initial Globe and Mail story on the event ("Israeli strike kills dozens at UN school," Jan. 7) reported that the Israeli attack was "on" the school.

Thus Martin's Jan. 29 story corrects many previous reports – including his own. Significantly, it started the ball rolling toward a correct, consistent, accounting of the events by the United Nations.

In a Feb. 2 Ha'aretz article, "UN backtracks on claim that deadly IDF strike hit Gaza school," Amos Harel, referring to Martin's report, wrote: "The United Nations has reversed its stance on one of the most contentious and bloody incidents of the recent Israel Defense Forces operation in Gaza, saying that an IDF mortar strike that killed 43 people on Jan. 6 did not hit one of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency schools after all."

Harel quoted Maxwell Gaylord, the UN humanitarian coordinator in Jerusalem, who said that the UN "would like to clarify that the shelling and all of the fatalities took place outside, and not inside, the school."

Homeless enjoy kosher meal at shul

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Although only a handful of this city's homeless population is Jewish, they were given an opportunity to come in from the cold on a recent winter day and enjoy a warm and delicious kosher lunch.

In fact, several hundred homeless people were invited to join them, whether they needed, wanted or even understood the meaning of kosher food.

Jewish Family Services of Ottawa (JFS) spearheaded an event that was a lesson in community co-operation, multicultural understanding and goodwill. Teaming up with several churches and community organizations that work with the homeless, JFS arranged for the kosher meal to be served at Congregation Beth Shalom synagogue in downtown Ottawa.

David Smith, owner of Creative Kosher Caterers, volunteered to prepare the Jan. 26 meal with food donated by local businesses.

"This time of year, after Christmas, can be a rather isolating time of year for the homeless," said Mark Zarecki, executive director of JFS.

"For us, this is an example of tikkun olam… whenever I have been on the streets [with JFS' Street Smarts program], there are 10 to 12 Jews or Muslims who want kosher or halal food."

Once the planning started, word spread and volunteers began to call, but so many came forward that some had to be turned away.

Angela Campbell, director of fundraising at the Shepherds of Good Hope, a Christian organization that helps the poor, was on the organizing committee.

"It's like linking arms, a community effort," she said. "I was amazed at how this effort got so many volunteers."

The sentiment was shared by JFS president Jack Shinder, who noted that many people took a day off work in the middle of the week to serve meals.

"The event somehow touched the volunteer base in a way that is somewhat unique," he said.

Volunteer Linda Rossman was one of those who answered the call.

"I would do it again next year. I wish I could do more," she said.

When all was said and done, some 200 meals were served – only about half the number that was anticipated. Part of the reason was a lack of public transportation due to a two-month-old transit strike, making it difficult for people to get to the synagogue. In a gesture of goodwill, several striking bus drivers volunteered to drive homeless people to and from the event.

Jane Scharf said she thoroughly enjoyed her meal of soup, salad, kafta, potato and dessert. She and two friends had high praise for the effort.

"I am happy that this community respects the poor enough to put on an event like this. This is a community that is very important to me. It is a population of people that needs a lot more attention… Everyone was treated with respect and dignity," Scharf said.

Zarecki said he hopes that the kosher meal for the homeless can become an annual event.

Senator 'dismayed' over jailed Hamas legislators

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Liberal Senator Sharon Carstairs recently voiced concerns about Hamas parliamentarians who are in prison in Israel. They were arrested shortly after being elected in 2006.

Carstairs expressed her views on CBC Radio on Jan. 25.

In a telephone interview, Carstairs, who is chair of the Inter-Parliamentary Union's (IPU) committee of human rights of parliamentarians, said that after the elections in the West Bank and Gaza in 2006, 34 Hamas members "who were duly elected" were "taken to Israel," some "as early as April 2006."

> 'If they are guilty of terrorist acts, they should be charged'

Carstairs said that most of the parliamentarians "have never been charged or tried." She said that "if they are guilty of terrorist acts, they should be charged and prosecuted, but up to this point most of them haven't been brought to trial."

Carstairs said that as chair of the IPU Committee, she has an obligation to raise this issue. She said that according to the IPU, there are more than 300 parliamentarians in 29 countries in these types of situations.

Carstairs added that "Israel supported the elections in 2006, and they said these [people] will be duly elected parliamentarian."

Carstairs also noted "two of these individuals [elected Hamas members] were charged and tried and convicted, but the only charge was that they belonged to Hamas," which Carstairs said wasn't a proper charge, and she is "dismayed" by the handling of these cases.

Carstairs said it's "fair to say that because Fatah is in charge of the Palestinian Authority [in the West Bank], their original demands for the release of [Hamas parliamentarians] have been lessened to some degree." This, she said, is because "Fatah and Hamas are rivals."

Carstairs emphasized that the issue she has raised has "nothing to do" with Israel's recent military operation in Gaza.

"My view is that Israel is entitled to have a secure border and security for its people. Although none of us like what's happened in Gaza, Israel has a right to defend herself," Carstairs said.

On Feb. 4, Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Canada-Israel Committee, issued a response to Carstairs' concerns about the Hamas parliamentarians. "The Hamas-affiliated individuals currently detained in Israel who are the subject of Senator Carstairs' concern… are believed to be connected to various terrorist activities. Their parliamentary association does not render them immune to detention or prosecution by Israel for their alleged roles in terrorist plots," Fogel said.

"Some have been released by Israel (e.g., Hassam Khader) as a goodwill gesture to PA President Mahmoud Abbas, and all benefit from treatment that is in full accord with Israeli and international law."

Fogel added that the CIC "understands the desire on the part of Canadian parliamentarians to advocate for the safety of all democratically elected lawmakers. However, we regret that Senator Carstairs… did not reach out to the CIC or the Israeli Embassy before offering any comment, despite efforts by the embassy to contact her."

Carstairs said that she tried to contact the Israeli ambassador before raising her concerns. "I have been asking to meet with the Israeli ambassador for over a year and a half," she said.

Since The CJN's interview with Carstairs, a meeting was set up. Carstairs is to speak with Israeli Ambassador Miriam Ziv on Feb. 26.

English teachers needed in Israel

Compiled by CJN Staff

A screening day will be held Feb. 26 for a program being launched to help 50 new olim become English teachers in Israel.

Sponsored by the Jewish Agency for Israel, Israel's Ministry of Education, the Ministry of Immigrant Absorption, and Nefesh B'Nefesh, the program provides a supportive framework for young immigrants to acquire a profession and to help meet the growing demand for qualified English teachers in Israel.

Those eligible include singles or married couples who hold bachelor's degrees in any field or discipline and are eligible to make aliyah. Once selected, olim receive housing at the Jerusalem Beit Canada or Raanana absorption centres and go on to get a teacher's certificate for elementary and high school at the David Yellin College in Jerusalem or the Lewinsky College in the greater Tel Aviv area.

The 14-month training period includes Hebrew ulpan, teacher training and a paid internship. Newly certified teachers will be offered positions in schools according to local needs and within the official pay scale for new teachers.

The program includes an absorption basket of approximately 1,500 shekels per month, a living stipend and free tuition.

Film fest drops prize sponsored by Jewish group

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — After one of its jurors resigned in protest last year, a long-established Quebec film festival dropped a prize created and sponsored by the Jewish community intended to promote tolerance because festival organizers feel it's inappropriate to be associated with any "political pressure" group.

Les Rendez-vous du Cinéma Québécois, whose 27th edition opens Feb. 18, will not be presenting the $5,000 Alex and Ruth Dworkin Prize, which since 2006 had been awarded to a film that contributes to understanding among different people.

The prize became a source of controversy last year when one of the festival's three jurors, Malcolm Guy, resigned because of the purported rigidly pro-Israel stance of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), which helped conceive the award, and the Dworkins' support of the Jewish National Fund (JNF).

The Dworkin Foundation is administered by the Jewish Community Foundation of Montreal (JCF), and the prize was launched by Rendez-vous in collaboration with CJC.

Rendez-vous executive director Ségolène Roederer said in an interview with The CJN that the festival's board decided to eliminate the prize because the festival "couldn't prove that the foundation was not really involved with CJC."

The festival was never able to get a satisfactory answer as to what the link between the foundation and CJC was, so the prize was eliminated, she said.

The decision was made well before the launch of Israel's operation in Gaza, she added.

"The Rendez-vous cannot have relations with any lobby or pressure group, or any political or religious organization of any kind. It is not appropriate," Roederer said.

The festival's board regards CJC as such a lobby group, she said, adding that whether it is pro-Israel or not isn't the issue.

"We really gave this a lot of thought. It was a process," she continued.

The link between the prize and CJC, however, has always been clear. The establishment of the prize was announced at a press conference launching the 2006 Rendez-vous festival.

CJC issued a press release stating that the annual prize had been conceived by CJC in co-operation with Rendez-vous, a showcase of new, locally made films.

At the time, CJC said it hoped that the collaboration would foster a positive partnership between the Jewish and francophone communities in Quebec.

Roederer acknowledged that CJC's involvement from the outset was known, and regrets that the festival did not look more deeply into what it was getting into.

"We did not do our job fully… I think we were a little too quick [to get involved]," she said.

Guy's resignation, however, brought the issue to the fore, she said. "He made some accusations that we were never able to find out if they were true or not." However, sufficient doubt was raised to end the relationship.

Guy, a Montreal film director and producer, wrote in a widely circulated open letter that, after looking more closely into the background of the prize's sponsors, he did not want his name associated with it. He said the money was "tainted" and urged Rendez-vous not to accept it.

He called CJC "a vehicle for the Israeli propaganda machine," denounced JNF, which the Dworkins supported, for "the massive displacement of the Palestinian people and the occupation of their land" and protested the Israeli "siege" of Gaza.

Guy is not associated with this year's festival.

The whole affair has left JCF executive director Robert Kleinman deeply disillusioned, given that the prize was created in good faith to foster dialogue and that its demise was provoked by what he sees as a misrepresentation of the facts. "I can't say Guy lied, but he put together facts in order to make us believe in a lie."

Kleinman also has a different version of events.

He said he asked for a meeting with the board to deal with Guy's charges, but was not granted one, yet he was assured by the president that the prize was secure.

Several months ago, the festival's directors informed Kleinman that the prize was being abolished. He again requested a meeting with the board to discuss the matter in full and to plead for the retention of the prize. But that was never granted, either, he said.

"I personally feel a great sense of disappointment and injustice," Kleinman said. Guy's letter was, Kleinman wrote at the time, "totally gratuitous and unfounded."

For one thing, CJC does not speak on issues related to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, he said.

The Dworkin film prize was created in the aftermath of the violent protest against the appearance of former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu at Concordia University in 2002. The Dworkin family wanted to contribute in some way to restoring a better climate in the city.

Protect yourself from liability

Question: Could you please advise me what I should do to protect myself from being liable in the future for the debts incurred by my spouse on his credit cards (they are held in his name only). We jointly own a home and I am wondering if the companies would take the house over if the payments could not be made. I am planning a separation.

Answer: If your name is not on your spouse's credit cards you are not normally legally liable for any debts incurred. There are still some credit card companies or collection agencies that use old common law principles that if a wife charges "necessities of life" such as food, clothing or shelter on a credit card that is solely in her name, then her husband has a responsibility under "common law" to pay those debts — not as a matter of contract law, but as a law arising from their marriage.

Recently, certain creative agents from creditors have tried to extend this old common law principle to include anything and everything, including family vacations, haircuts and CD's. However, the courts are becoming less patient with this old common law principle. Although you may not have a direct obligation to the debt, you could still end up paying for half if the credit card company sues your husband successfully and hubby still fails to pay. The creditor could then file the judgment against your jointly owned home. When you attempt to refinance or sell the home, that judgment is enforced and bingo, you have now paid half of your husband's debt from your share of the sale proceeds.

If you separate you could sue your husband for your loss, but that costs money. To prevent any of this you could have the house transferred solely into your name. But you can only safely do so five years before he is sued. Otherwise, you and your husband could be sued for a "fraudulent conveyance." Then the transfer of the home into your name could be reversed by the court on the request of the creditor.

Jam-packed JUMP fundraiser attracts eclectic group

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

It's been just one year since the Jewish Urban Meeting Place (JUMP) opened its doors to Jewish students and young professionals seeking a venue to meet, mingle and network, and the JUMP staff and members celebrated in style.

On Jan. 31, 500 people who have been touched by JUMP in some way trudged through the snow to eat, drink and party at Steam Whistle Brewing.

The event, which was held to raise money for the non-profit organization that offers subsidized trips to Israel and weekly programs at the Thornhill centre, featured a DJ and live entertainment, including performances from a percussionist and a breakdancing troupe.

The evening also featured a silent auction with prizes, among them two round-trip tickets to Israel, jewelry, tickets to sporting events, spa packages, gift certificates, original artwork and more.

"What is unique is that some of the products were going for money and some of the products were going for volunteer hours, but every single thing in the auction has at least one volunteer hour attached to it," said Debbie Osiel, JUMP's 28-year-old managing director.

Osiel, who has been working tirelessly on making the centre available to as many Jewish young professionals in the Greater Toronto Area as possible, said that the demand has exceeded her expectations on how many people she thought she would reach in one year.

Today, JUMP boasts 1,700 members, and runs two to three programs a week at the centre.

"Clearly, the demand is pushing us to create more initiatives, more programs more trips, and more volunteer opportunities," Osiel said.

"We are continuously coming up with new programs, so for us, it isn't enough that a program is doing well. Although we love it, we always have to come up with new ideas. Even if something is working, we are still trying to continuously improve it."

Debbie Osiel and Shlomo Buzaglo at JUMP's one-year anniversary party at Steam Whistle Brewing.

She said that while the JUMP staff – including Shlomo Buzaglo, the trips and outreach manager, and Shoshana Allen, the program manager – try to create programs that appeal to anyone, they also work to keep it fresh to keep members coming back.

"We listen to what people want. People tell us that the reason they love coming – besides the fact that they can just come to the centre, come to the kitchen, open the fridge, take off their shoes and make themselves a coffee – is that we actually listen to what people want. We create on demand," Osiel said.

She said that one of the most popular programs JUMP runs is the Dinner and Discussion program, which attracts about 60 people each week.

Sheri Becker, a JUMP member, said one of her favourite programs is Dinner and Discussion because she loves the idea of learning new things and meeting new people.

"When I go, I don't know anyone there because there are always new faces and you can tell that the people feel at home there. The environment is really welcoming, and the speakers are always knowledgeable," she said.

Becker, who worked on the committee to spread the word about the JUMP fundraiser, was thrilled with the success of the event.

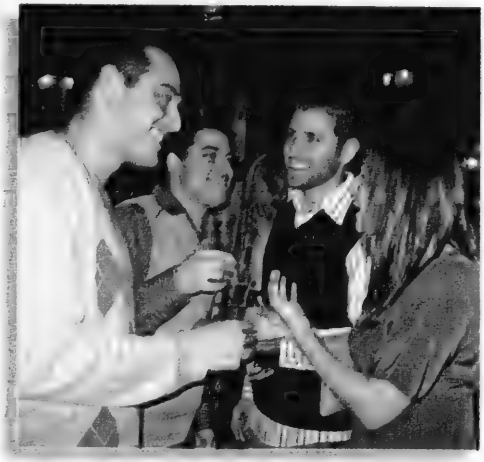
"Everyone from outgoing to shy people could go out to the same party and feel like they were a part of a community," she said.

"I think the party was such a success. It was really an eclectic group of people. For me, it exceeded my goals. I didn't think that many people would be there, but it was jam-packed. I loved the venue. It wasn't religious, but there was still a Jewish feel about it. It was really welcoming, and JUMP staff were always around, so you knew who was behind it."

Becker said she is also impressed with JUMP as an organization that works to keep Jewish youths feeling like a part of the community.

"For people, who don't have a place to go or don't have a social network, it has opened a whole new door. People have found a new family, new friends, and every Shabbat, if their families aren't observant, they know that they can go for Shabbat dinner at JUMP and it is always an open-door policy."

Osiel said if the organization had more more funding, she would love to be able to open JUMP centres in downtown Toronto and other cities in North America.



Jewish young professionals share a laugh while schmoozing at the Jewish Urban Meeting Place (JUMP) event.

"I was always brought up with a sense of community, but to be able to translate it into a passion for community building and for connecting with human beings within our culture and to be able to share how beautiful Judaism is, and to be able to share my passion of our culture keeps me inspired to keep doing more and more," Osiel said.

She said it is sometimes difficult to sell their cause to donors because there are so many others around the world who are in need, but she believes in the importance of strengthening the Jewish community.

"What we're doing is really standing up for the future generations."

JUMPers cut loose on the dance floor as a percussionist performed his set.

Fundraiser helps kids fight cancer

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Evan Erlick was only 13 when he lost his battle with brain cancer in December 2006.

During his nearly two-year ordeal, he had two dreams – that cancer could be eradicated, and that children having cancer treatments at Toronto's Hospital for Sick Children could have someplace where they would be able to play games, relax and, for a little while, just be kids.

A fundraiser to help bring his dreams to fruition will be held Feb. 25 at Tryst Nightclub, 82 Peter St., at 7:30. In a Cuban atmosphere, Hot Havana Nights will feature signature cocktails, an open bar, hors d'oeuvres, live and silent auctions, live entertainment, a DJ and a dancer. The 500 participants will celebrate "in spicy salsa or cool cocktail attire," SickKids organizer Jaime Wilson said.

Proceeds will be shared between SickKids, for the special room, and the Israel Cancer Research Fund (ICRF), which sponsors cancer research in Israel. Wilson said that construction of the new waiting room at SickKids will begin later this month.

It is hoped that Evan's dream will be an annual affair, Wilson said. "Last year's event, the first, Funky Black & White Masquerade, was held at This is London Nightclub. It raised over $300,000."

Evan's mother, Lisa Erlick, described her late son as "feisty, a typical kid, who got into trouble."

He showed the same qualities as a cancer patient, she said. "He was a real trooper, coping with many surgeries, radiation and chemotherapy."

The idea for a kids' playroom came when Evan watched children waiting for blood test results, treatments or consultations.

"He felt that they should have somewhere that they could, for a little while, just have fun as kids," Erlick said.

The new room will be "bright and airy, with games, stickies and all kinds of things," she added.

Joy Wagner Arbus, executive director of ICRF, said that its portion of the proceeds will go to fund research that the organization's scientific review panel considers to have the most potential to save lives.

The partnership between SickKids and the ICRF has not just been successful, she said. "but our causes are synergistic. We both hope to save lives of kids like Evan.

"The room will give a better experience for kids undergoing a terrible experience," Wagner Arbus added.

Erlick said services and fundraising are affected by the current recession. "There are long lineups for chemotherapy, which makes it hard for everyone. Cancer isn't affected by a recession."

An emotional Erlick, who has been involved with ICRF for a long time, said, "If the kids go through so much, this project is the least I can do."

Tickets, at $180 per person, are available online at www.icrftoronto.org or www.sickkidsleaders.com/evan, or by telephone at 416-440-7781.

HELPING OUT: Mikayla Wolfe 6 and her brother Jordan, 3, recently met with Jennifer McWilliam, manager of community development and donor relations at Bloorview Kids Rehab, to donate a portion of their birthday gifts from this past year to the hospital. McWilliam took them on a tour of the building, introducing them to the children there and showing them the different areas they use, such as the the library, classrooms, pool and gym.

Obituary

Gryfe matriarch co-founded bagel bakery

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Ruth Gryfe, who died late last month after a brief illness at age 92, will be remembered for her fierce loyalty to her family and for her determination to get done what she wanted done.

A founder of Gryfe's Bagel Bakery with her husband, Arthur, Gryfe worked side by side with him until he died in 1998.

Bernie Gryfe, Ruth's son, said his father had been a cake baker when his parents opened their business in 1956, but he had never baked a bagel.

"Someone came in, though, and requested bagels. Never saying 'no,' my mother took the order, and they spent the night experimenting. The rest is history."

He said his mother also helped found Ner Israel Yeshiva, an Orthodox high school for boys, in 1959, because she didn't want his brother to go away to Cincinnati, Ohio, to study.

An attempt had been made previously to get some students together, but it wasn't successful, Gryfe said. "My mother found students, and the school opened."

When he was preparing his eulogy, Gryfe said, he was told to keep humour to a minimum, "but it was very difficult. To me, my mother was the funniest woman in the world. She was a Lucille Ball without knowing it."

Relating one of the stories, he said that when his son was a youngster, he looked out the window and said, "'Bubbie, there's a cat outside.' She looked at it and said 'That's not a cat, it's a dog, and I've been feeding it for five years. I would never feed a cat, I hate cats.'

"I looked out and said, 'Mom, that's a cat.' After pondering the situation, her retort was 'You know, I always thought there was something fishy about that dog. I never heard it bark once in five years.'"

It's hard to remember his mother with sadness, he said, "because I can't remember any time she made me sad."

Barbara Gryfe Hakuk, Gryfe's daughter who now lives in Israel, said she's now a professional singer who got her start because her mother got her on the radio. "If she wanted something, she would not stop for anything."

She said that her mother's love for Yiddishkeit was unlimited. She was always grateful for everything and always said "Baruch HaShem."

She even taught her dedicated caregiver, Reine Abad, to say it, Gryfe Hakuk said.

Gryfe's grandson, Daniel, said that in his travels, he's always asked if Ruth Gryfe is his grandmother. "[I would hear the same story] time and time again. When they came into our store, they remember getting a piece of bagel from a nice, short, Jewish woman," he said in his eulogy.

"Yiddishkeit was my grandmother's essence. She prided herself on her affiliation with Ner Israel, and her family was her life. Each of her children had their special place in her heart."

Gryfe is survived by her daughter Barbara, sons Moishe and Bernie, as well as eight grandchildren and 17 great-grandchildren. She was predeceased by her husband, Arthur, and a son, Hershy.

RCMP investigating two incidents at UBC

In both cases, it's alleged that the pro-Palestinian student ripped Star of David necklaces from the necks of the victims, police said.

But according to Daniel, the student involved in the first incident who asked that his last name not be printed, there are certain aspects of the police news release that aren't accurate.

Daniel told The CJN that he and three of his friends were walking through the residence, floor by floor, while video-recording a scavenger hunt.

"We made our way down a hallway and we saw a door with some anti-Israel posters on it – some with the Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigade, Hamas – which we found offensive," he said, adding that his friend decided to take them down.

Daniel said they heard someone moving in the dorm room, so they fled, but the pro-Palestinian student caught up with him.

"I was manhandled, scratched. I was grabbed, choked, put in a headlock. Basically, I'm pretty bruised up," Daniel said.

He added that although his attacker didn't hurl any anti-Semitic slurs at him during the altercation, "as soon as he saw my Star of David, he ripped it off."

Daniel said the RCMP news release was wrong to say that he was restrained by his attacker. Rather, he said he was being roughed up until the two resident advisers arrived to separate the two men.

He also denied making racist slurs against his attacker.

"Everything that I said to him was either a plea for my safety or asking him to consider the fact that he could get charged. There were no racial slurs at all. I did not negatively insult my attacker at all. I can guarantee you that if I did, I would be in a lot worse physical condition right now."

Daniel said that his roommate – the other Jewish student who was involved in a fight with the same pro-Palestinian student less than an hour later – "didn't do anything to provoke him or say anything during the attack."

Pat Johnson, managing director of Vancouver Hillel, said that the Jewish students involved in the second altercation were also participating in the same scavenger hunt and they were in the vicinity of the dorm room by chance.

"These students are not people who go looking for trouble," Johnson said.

He said that while the Jewish students should have complained to the school's administration to have the offensive posters removed, there is never a justification for physical violence.

"We are very concerned that there has been tension on the campuses since we came back from winter break, as there has been on a lot of North American campuses [following Israel's military operation in Gaza], but when it crosses a line from tension to violence, we have reason to be extremely concerned," he said.

"The fact that in both cases, the students had their Magen David [necklaces] ripped from their necks is a deep concern."

Romy Ritter, director of Canadian Jewish Congress' Pacific region, said that while there are elements of the police news release that don't entirely reflect the Jewish students' accounts of the incidents, she's confident that once all the evidence is gathered, justice will be served.

"Once [the police] finish their investigation and review all the evidence, the truth and the facts of what really transpired will come to light," Ritter said.

She added that she's been in touch with the police and "has been reassured that they are taking this incident very seriously, and the hate crime team is actively investigating as well."

No arrests have been made, and the investigation into whether the incidents were motivated by hate is still ongoing, Ritter said.

Anti-Israel resolution shelved by McGill students

More than 700 students attended the assembly, which was closed to the media. This was an extraordinarily high number, and about 50 had to be turned away, Turner said. The SSMU fall general assembly did not attract even the quorum of 150.

Hillel had criticized the resolution as a one-sided and inaccurate condemnation of Israel, and warned that if it passed it would "turn McGill into an environment where hate, fear and division flourish" and result in an "unprecedented polarization that will isolate and marginalize" students and staff.

According to the rules, the SSMU was obliged to entertain the opponents' motion, Turner said, as it was to put the resolution, proposed by the student club Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights (SPHR), on the agenda. Any undergraduate or student club can present a resolution if the signatures of at least 100 undergraduates are attached to it.

The resolution called on the SSMU to condemn "the bombing of educational institutions in Gaza, including the Islamic University in Gaza City and the UNRWA-run schools," and asked McGill principal Heather Munroe-Blum and the Canadian government to do the same. The group also wanted the SSMU to undertake a public campaign to support the right to education of Palestinian students in Gaza.

The resolution stated that educational and other civilian institutions, including hospitals, were deliberately targeted.

חדשה בקנדה

נינה שנהב

אם תשאלו אותי, אני שומרת כשרות. לא כל אחד יסכים, אבל מבחינתי אני כן. אני לא נוגעת בבייקון, בשרימפס, או בשאר פירות הים המלבבים. גם בקר לא מוכשר לא בא אל פי. אני כן אוכלת עוף לא גלאט כושר.

רוב החברים שלי בישראל מלגלגים נואשות על התכונה הזו שלי, לאכול כשר, ודבים אפילו חושבים שזה לא מתאים לאופי הפתוח והשובבי שלי. רוב חבריי חילוניים מובהקים, ובשהייתי מצייצת במסעדה "לא" רפה לקלמרי, הייתי חשה במבטי פליאה ואפילו זילזול.

עדיין, אלו הם החברים שלי, ובכל אספקט אחר אנו דומים להפליא. בקנדה, הדבר לא שונה בהרבה. נכון שיש לי ידידים שומרי מסורת, אבל אצל ידידיי החילוניים, אני בחזקת דיסוננס. לידידים הלא יהודים שלי אני בכלל לא מספרת. א' כי כשניסיתי, אף אחד לא ידע על מה אני מדברת בכלל. וב' אלה שכן ידעו, הרגשתי שזה מרחיק בינינו.

אותו יום חביב, קיבלתי הזמנת יום הולדת מג'ניפר, ידידה לא יהודיה שהכרתי יומיים לפני (תציצו לטור שלי מלפני שבועיים, ותבינו למה הדגשתי 'יומיים לפני'). הזמנתי לארוחת ערב חגיגית במסעדה יוקרתית.

"אל תשכחי שאת אוכלת כשר!" התרה בי מאיר לפני שיצאתי.

המסעדה נראתה נפלא. נישקתי את ידידתי העשירה (בהזדמנות נדבר על מה צריך להביא פה למתנת יומולדת, או-קיי?) ונטלתי בשמחה את התפריט ההדור. "את יכולה להחליט מה את מזמינה, אבל בעקרון ג'ני כבר הזמינה לנו את המנות הכי מפוארות!" לחשה לי שכנתי לשולחן. בדיוק אז הגיע מלצר מנומס, והניח לפני כל אחד מאיתנו צלחת מלאה בשרימפסים ענקיים וידרדרים, שחייכו אלי בקריצות מהצלחת.

כולם התחילו לטבול ולזלול, ורק אני שתקתי ושיחקתי קצת עם החברה'ס השמנמנים. לנוכח מבטי המפליאה, אמרתי שקר לי לאכול משהו קר, ומייד שיניתי נושא. הצלחת שלי חזרה מלאה לידי המלצר המעולב. "תיכף יהיה משהו חם." הבטיחה לי ג'ניפר בחיוך, והוסיפה "לא ידעתי שבישראל אוכלים רק שרימפסים חמים." המנה העיקרית הגיעה במלא תפארתה: צלעות חזיר פריכות על מצע פירה וגרידת בייקון ואגוזים מעל. כולם התחילו לזלול, בעוד אני משחקת עם הצלעות המזמינות ולא מביאה שום דבר אל פי.

פה כבר התחילו להפציע המבטים התמהים מצד הסביבה המנומסת. "אני...אני לא ממש משוגעת על חזיר..." מילמלתי בביישנות. ידידתי השבושה קראה מייד למלצר (שהתחיל לשנוא אותי), והודתה לו לדוחי לי בקצרה על כל מנות השף. הכל היה לובסטרי וחזירי למדי, עד שנעצרנו במנת עוף. "עוף!" צעקתי בחדווה, "אני אקח עוף!". זו כנראה היתה המנה הכי פחות נחשבת, כי כולם מעט התפלאו. כולם התפלאו הרבה יותר, כשהמנה המקושטת הגיעה אל שולחני, ושוב לא עשתה שום קולות של להגיע אלי לפה. אתם מבינים, הנתח המקסים היה טבול כולו בחמאה, מצופה בשוקולד ובשמנת, וכדי להעצים את הרגע, פיזרו עליו גם מוצרלה מותכת. ג'ניפר הביטה בי בשורת רוח (בכל זאת, שילמה על המנות שלי מספר לא מבוטל של דולרים), ולא אמרה מילה.

ג'ניפר הביטה בי בהקלה. "את בדיאטה?" שאלה, הנהנתי באומץ. שאר המסובים בחנו את מתניי. היקף ישבני, מה שלא תרצו (לפחות אני לא רוצה). "כל הכבוד!" אמרה לבסוף שכנתי לשולחן. "חשבתי שאאוכל לא טעים לך." הוסיפה ג'ניפר בהקלה. "לא מזיק לאף אחד קצת לשמוח." הנהן גברבר ממולי, שמעתה ועד עולם יהיה אויבי. מספר משפטי הסכמה מולמלו, והכל חזר למקומו בשלום (למרות שסירבתי גם לעוף ברוטב יוגורט דל קלוריות).

"ינאכשיו," הכריז המלצר המנומס שלנו באושר, "הקינוחים!" המלצר הוביל בגאווה ענלת כסף, ובה מיליון מנות קינוח מדהימות שלא ראיתי מעודי: עוגות קצפת חלביות במרקם מרנג ונגינה, פחזניות שקולוד נוטפות מוצרט מופס עם סל פירות יער ממותקים בפודינג, שבבות של קרם ובצק עלים בשלל גוונים ומרקמים, ומה לא. הריח נטף לי מהפה. הנה הגיע הביצוי לכל הסיוט שעברתי.

כולם הזמינו, ובדיוק כשהגיע תורי לבחור, הניחה ג'ניפר את ידועה על כתפי ולחשה: "תהיי חזקה. ביקשתי מהמלצר שיביא לך כמה פירות חתוכים מהטבטה."

נו, גם תפוח זה קינוח...

Anti-Israel resolution shelved at McGill

Hillel said the figures cited by SPHR concerning the number of schools struck and the number of casualties in Gaza and who they were is still in dispute.

The resolution was unprecedented at McGill, where debate over Middle Eastern politics has been low-key compared to some other Canadian campuses, and it touched off heated debate in the week before the biannual general assembly. The resolution was the subject of much space in the student press and online, through the Facebook social networking site.

Hillel had attempted to prevent the resolution from being entertained by the SSMU, arguing that the SSMU constitution states that the body's council "will not take a position on external political issues that council deems to be extremely divisive among students at McGill University."

The SSMU speaker did not agree with this interpretation, Turner said.

SPHR spokesperson Khaled Kteily said before the assembly that the intention was to have the student body "recognize that, without the basic human right to education, no real progress will ever be made [in the Palestinian-Israel conflict] and that through the destruction and damage of schools and universities, Israel is infringing upon the Gazan civilians' basic human rights."

Turner said that in the five years of her association with the SSMU, it has not received any resolution proposal so emotionally charged.

"Certainly, the resolution caused a lot of controversy, and it is a divisive issue because there are incredibly strong views on both sides. But even though passions were high, the debate was substantive and as civilized as one could expect when the issue is so personal to so many people."

Another indication that Middle East politics are becoming more contentious at McGill is the public endorsement by 30 its professors and employees of a boycott of Israeli academic institutions, including such respected professors as Gregory Baum and Margaret Lock. Their names appeared among the more than 80 staff of Quebec universities and colleges signing a manifesto published in Le Devoir last month.

Succeeding at Medical and Dental School Interviews

Being selected to interview is a significant achievement and a key step toward acceptance to medical or dental school. The final stage of the application process offers the candidate an opportunity to shine and distinguish him or herself from other qualified applicants.

While there is no way to predict exactly what will be asked, certain topics invariably arise relating to university experience, work and extracurricular activities, and motivation for becoming a physician or dentist. Although success cannot be guaranteed, performance can improve significantly with insight into the interview process, adequate preparation for common questions, and knowledge of health care issues and current events. Practicing interview skills is an important step to build confidence and avoid frequent pitfalls on the day of the interview.

Expert advice can make the process less daunting, allowing candidates to maximize their chances of success. We can assist applicants with mock interviews in traditional, multiple mini interview (MMI) and structured formats. The result is the strongest interview possible, one that highlights the candidate's unique character and individual strengths.

Deal to release Schalit reportedly in the works

By AVI ISSACHAROFF
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspapers Ltd.

JERUSALEM — A deal for the release of abducted Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit hinges on a dispute between Israel and Hamas over four Palestinian prisoners whom Israel refuses to free, two pan-Arab newspapers reported Monday.

Israel has agreed, however, to release all of the other prisoners Hamas is demanding in return for Schalit, the London-based dailies Al-Quds, al-Arabi and Al-Sharq Al-Awsat reported.

The papers named the four as Abdullah Barghouti, Ibrahim Hamad and Abbas Sayed, all Hamas men, and Ahmed Sa'adat, the leader of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine.

Each of the prisoners was behind a string of terror attacks. Sayed was the mastermind behind the massacre at the Park Hotel in Netanya on Passover in 2002, in which 29 civilians were killed.

Abdullah Barghouti, a relative of jailed Fatah leader Marwan Barghouti, prepared the bomb belts and devices used in terror attacks, including the bombings in Jerusalem at the Sbarro pizza parlor, the Moment café and the cafeteria at the Hebrew University, as well as the suicide attack at the Sheffield snooker hall in Rishon Letzion.

Hamad, the commander of the armed wing of Hamas in Ramallah, has also been convicted of involvement in a number of these attacks.

Sa'adat is in jail for ordering the 2001 assassination of former tourism minister Rehavam Ze'evi.

The Egyptian daily Al-Gomhoria, meanwhile, reported Monday that Hamas and Israel would reach an agreement for a truce in Gaza within the next 48 hours.

The reports came after Egyptian sources told Ha'aretz on Sunday that Hamas has acceded over the past few days to the Israeli demand to link the opening of Gaza's border crossings to the release of Schalit.

UNRWA suspends distribution

JTA

A United Nations relief agency is suspending operations in the Gaza Strip until Hamas returns supplies it seized.

A spokesperson for the United Nations Relief and Works Agency said last Friday that unless Hamas refrains from interfering with distribution, it will not resume operations.

The terror group, which controls Gaza, seized 200 tons of food and supplies last week that had been stored by UNRWA, the largest distributor of relief in the strip. Western nations ban direct dealings with Hamas. The group seeks control of all facets of relief in areas it controls as a way of maintaining its political leverage.

There were multiple reports last week of armed Hamas men raiding UNRWA storage areas.

Vatican calls on bishop to recant denial of the Holocaust

JTA

NEW YORK — The Vatican has called on a Holocaust-denying bishop to recant his views.

In a statement Feb. 4, the Vatican secretariat of state said that Bishop Richard Williamson "must absolutely, unequivocally and publicly distance himself from his positions on the Shoah."

Bishop Williamson, a member of a schismatic Catholic sect, said in a recent television interview that he doubted the existence of Nazi gas chambers and believed that only a few hundred thousand Jews lost their lives during the Holocaust. His views generated a crisis for the church after Pope Benedict XVI revoked a long-standing excommunication order against Bishop Williamson and three other bishops last month.

The statement comes as more voices were added to the chorus of criticism that has greeted Benedict's decision to pursue greater unity within the church by moving towards a rapprochement with the renegade sect.

Bishop Richard Williamson

The president of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, Cardinal Francis George of Chicago, said Feb. 3 that Bishop Williamson's views were "utterly false," the Catholic News Service reported. And on Feb. 4, the World Jewish Congress weighed in, saying the Pope's decision was "badly advised" and welcoming the Vatican's insistence that the bishop recant.

Israel's Foreign Ministry released a statement saying that the Jewish state viewed the reinstatement "with regret and concern."

The statement continued: "The reinstatement of a Holocaust denier by the Holy See offends every Jew, in Israel and around the world, and humiliates the memory of all Holocaust victims and survivors. We expect the Holy See to decisively renounce all Holocaust deniers in general, wherever they may be, and Bishop Williamson in particular.

"We view the recent remarks made by the Holy See and senior Vatican officials admonishing the manifestation of Holocaust denial as the first step in the right direction, and expect more explicit and unequivocal decisions and statements on this issue."

Also last week, the Vatican rejected criticism by German Chancellor Angela Merkel, a Protestant, over the issue. Merkel called Feb. 3 for Pope Benedict to condemn Holocaust denial more clearly, but the Vatican countered that he had already condemned Holocaust denial in "unequivocal terms."

Hamas used rockets to sway vote: PA

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspapers Ltd.

The Palestinian Authority foreign minister said Monday that Hamas was trying to influence the outcome of Tuesday's general election by continuing to fire rockets into southern Israel.

Riad Malki said Hamas did not want to see a pro-peace government elected in Israel during the parliamentary vote, because such a government would pursue a political deal with the PA.

On Sunday, two rockets struck southern Israel, violating an informal Israel-Hamas truce.

Malki told reporters in Warsaw that the PA was very much worried that such attacks might really push Israeli public opinion and the voters to vote for an anti-peace government.

The foreign minister's comments came as polls suggested that Israel's next government could indeed be more hawkish than the current coalition, with the hardline Yisrael Beiteinu Party projected to win more Knesset seats than the left-of-centre Labor Party, and with the right-wing Likud party projected to the be the largest contingent in the Knesset.

The Kadima-led government under Prime Minister Ehud Olmert has pursued peace talks with the Palestinian Authority since the Annapolis Summit in November 2007. The summit, which focused on a two-state solution to the conflict, was meant to relaunch peace talks which had laid dormant since the outbreak of the second intifadah in 2000.

The talks did not include Hamas, which seized Gaza by force in 2007 and does not recognize Israel's right to exist.

Authors & Poets

The CJN is pleased to announce its

Annual Passover Literary Supplement

We invite our readers to submit unpublished, original works of fiction or poetry that explore Jewish themes. Stories should not exceed 2,000 words.

We must receive your submissions no later than Friday, March 12. E-mail submissions are preferred, but works can also be sent by mail or brought to our office. E-mail: info@cjnews.com. Mail: 1500 Don Mills Rd., Suite 205, Toronto, Ont., M3B 3K4. Submissions will not be returned. Only writers whose work is chosen for publication will be contacted.

CJN Purim Art Contest

It's time again for our annual Purim Art Contest.

Who can enter: Children in grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN's 2009 Purim Poster. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However, they should not be too small nor too large. Please paint or draw bright, bold, colourful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. Please send us your name, address, phone number, age and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, Toronto, Ont., M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 3 p.m. on Tuesday, Feb. 17, 2009. We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen as the "winners." The judges will base their decisions on a number of factors such as: the use of colour, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The chances of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, February 20, 2009.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of March 5, 2009. Have fun and good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

Aish HaTorah founder dies

JTA

JERUSALEM — Rabbi Noah Weinberg, the founder and dean of Aish HaTorah Institutes, died at his home in Jerusalem last week.

Weinberg, who was treated late last year with chemotherapy and radiation treatments, and who recently broke his leg and shoulder, was 78 when he died last Thursday morning, Feb. 5.

Obituary

Aish HaTorah, which Weinberg founded in 1974, operates 27 full-time branches throughout the world, with 100,000 people attending its programs annually in 77 cities in 17 countries. Aish HaTorah operates a rabbinical training college at the Western Wall in Jerusalem, as well as a hesder yeshiva where students combine military service with Torah study.

Rabbi Noah Weinberg

"Rabbi Weinberg dedicated his life to bringing a renaissance within Jewish people, to reach out to every Jew and reconnect him to the depth and meaning of our heritage," a statement from Aish HaTorah read. "The Jewish people are meant to be a light unto nations; Rabbi Weinberg undertook the task to galvanize the Jewish people and inspire us to live up to our mission and be Kiddush Hashem – to sanctify God's Name in this world."

Weinberg had made several attempts in the late 1960s to found a yeshiva for assimilated young men. He was a co-founder of the Ohr Somayach yeshiva for beginners and returnees to traditional Judaism.

He was a graduate of the Yeshivas Chaim Berlin in Brooklyn, N.Y., and Ner Yisrael in Baltimore, Md.

Rabbi Mitch Mandel, a founder of Aish HaTorah Toronto and its director of outreach and event programming, said that anybody who was in Rabbi Weinberg's presence felt "a combination of being loved and a sense that here is someone who believes in my potential, and has the ability to take Jewish wisdom and make it impactful and relevant to anybody."

Rabbi Mandel, who studied with Rabbi Weinberg from 1976 to 1980 after meeting him at the Kotel as a tourist, said, "I think that his greatness was in his love for the Jewish people and his love of God, and that they were the truest kind of love, because he understood that to really love God you have to love people, and to really love people you have to love God."

Toronto artist turns recycled material into jewelry

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Vera Fischer, a Toronto-based artist, hopes that her newest venture, creating something new and beautiful from the old and vintage, will enrich people's experiences and help them share in her creative process.

Fischer, whose artistic career has spanned over 40 years, is passionate about her "wearable art;" hand-crafted necklaces, bracelets and pins combining vintage pieces with free-form wire.

A "consummate collector" since 1975, Fischer said she enjoyed creating art from recycled material.

"The recycled art started with boxes and bottles, collecting materials that people would throw out, like at every birthday party for the kids, I kept all the paper… I'm a big collector of things that are reusable," said Fischer, who had her own gallery at Harbourfront Centre's Queen's Quay Terminal in the 1990s and had her paintings shown as part of various exhibits at the Koffler Gallery, John B. Aird Gallery, Columbus Centre and others.

Vera Fischer

"I started to go to Goodwill and places like Value Village to collect vintage jewelry and evening bags. I painted on the evening bags first, which I still do. They are hand-painted, one-of-a-kind evening bags. The jewelry I collected, there were pieces that broke, and I started to reclaim them and create new things out of them."

Fischer said that as a child growing up in Hungary, she was part of "a close family on whom a great shadow of tragedy hung." Both her parents were Holocaust survivors.

Her father, a master tinsmith and welder by trade, and her mother, determined to move forward from their tragic past, influenced her greatly, Fischer said.

But in 1956, the Hungarian Revolution began and her family decided to leave the country, their home and all their belongings.

"We, like many other Jewish people, turned around and left everything behind to illegally cross the border," Fischer said.

"When we came to Canada, I couldn't speak English and I was isolated. I felt lonely and isolated and art was how I communicated.

"Art was something that I excelled in throughout public school and later on. It really was a great part of my self-realization."

She said that her love of collecting old things and recreating them stem from her childhood.

"The past is mysterious. A lot of our family and heirlooms were gone and so I was drawn to things that had a history and that is why I, to do this day, collect old photographs… and so forth."

She said there is also an environmental aspect to her art. Fischer said she began collecting boxes, papers, and bottles for her collages because she hated the waste.

"The beautiful things that are thrown away – I hate it and I couldn't believe the things I could find, so certainly, call it what you like, recycle, reclaim, but there was a need for me to want to conserve it."

She said that while she benefits mentally and spiritually from the process of creating art, she hopes that it will enrich others as well.

"Creativity does grow in everyone, and it is satisfying to express yourself… It is also a tool in coping with changes in your life, and art has always been there for me in different stages," Fischer said.

"It's just a life-saving device because you're constantly able to work through things, and the fact that people respond to it is very nice."

She said she makes only about 50 or 60 pieces of her jewelry a year. Once her individual pieces grow in numbers, she hopes to put them on display at a gallery rather than a store, due to the amount of work she puts into them.

She has been selling her vintage-inspired jewelry and bags privately and at select stores. To contact Fischer, e-mail studiofischer@yahoo.com or call 416-638-0661.

Montreal teenager nominated for two Junos

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Teenage jazz singer Nikki Yanofsky's meteoric career has reached yet another high note with her nomination for two Juno music awards, including best new artist of the year.

Yanofsky, who turned 15 on Feb. 8, is also nominated for best vocal jazz album for her debut Ella… Of Thee I Swing, a CD/DVD package capturing her sold-out show, a tribute to Ella Fitzgerald, in Montreal last October.

The Junos will be held on March 28 at Vancouver's General Motors Place.

"I totally flipped out when I heard I was nominated," Yanofsky said. "I really, really appreciate just getting the nomination. It's such a great accomplishment that winning becomes almost irrelevant. I can't say how happy I am."

Yanofsky is competing with Crystal Shawanda, Jessie Farrell, Kreesha Turner and Lights for the new artist prize, and recordings by Diana Panton, Elizabeth Shepherd, Molly Johnson and Yvette Tollar for the album award.

Yanofsky's precocious talent, both as a singer and stage presence, first came to public attention when as an 11-year-old she performed with her father Richard's band Past Their Prime-Time Players at the Battle of the Bands, a fundraiser for Maimonides Geriatric Centre in Montreal.

The following year, she bowled over the public when she was the opening outdoor act at the Montreal Jazz Festival, the youngest performer to headline her own show in the festival's 29-year history.

Nikki Yanofsky

Last summer, she had four sold-out concerts, and another was presented in October because of the demand, which became the basis for the nominated album.

Her parents, Richard and Elyssa, say she has been singing since she could speak and that by age 10, her tastes had gravitated to classical jazz, especially the songs of the legendary Fitzgerald. She was soon belting out songs such as It Don't Mean a Thing and A Tisket, A Tasket, and she became particularly adept at scatting.

Her voice has been described as mature well beyond her years – both powerful and velvety – and she astonishes audiences with her confidence and poise.

Yanofsky said she has wanted to be a singer for as long as she can remember and sees her future as a singer "whether in a restaurant or before a global audience."

She insists she's having fun, and wouldn't be devoting herself to singing in the way she does if she wasn't.

"It's fabulous the way things are turning out," she said, adding that she plans to "follow the road wherever it leads."

She said she's often asked if she's missing out on doing the things other young people do, such as going to parties and hanging out with friends.

"I still do those things. I just sing as well," said Yanofsky, who appears to have remained remarkably humble.

The Grade 9 student recognizes she was born with an uncommon ear for song that allowed her to quickly picked up the music her parents liked to play. "My father says I have a photographic memory for music."

At the same time, Yanofsky stresses that she puts a lot of work into everything she does, and that's probably why she appears so poised on stage. "I've never felt any stage fright or nerves before a performance. I think all the work I put into a song really pays off."

Yanofsky has performed or collaborated with such stars as Oliver Jones, Céline Dion, Herbie Hancock, Wyclef Jean and Marvin Hamlisch, the latter at Carnegie Hall in New York and the Kennedy Center in Washington, D.C.

She has sung the national anthems for the Montreal Canadiens and for the Los Angeles Lakers, and at the CFL Grey Cup game in Montreal in November.

She is also a favourite at community events and headlined at the Hope & Cope 25th anniversary gala in 2006, the Montreal Children's Hospital fundraiser in 2007 and the 2008 Montreal ORT benefit last fall, to name a few.

Russian violist brings his unique style to Roy Thomson Hall

By RITA POLIAKOV
Special to The CJN

Svetlana Dvoretskaia was about 12 years old when she first saw violist Yuri Bashmet perform. The famous Tchaikovsky Hall in Moscow was packed, the crowd was excited and the police were guarding the venue. But what she remembered most was the silence.

"When he played, it's silence. No one's coughing," she said. "What I do remember is the silence after he finished – that moment when people are digesting the music, when the audience is still numb – then you have this explosion of applause."

On Feb.17, after several years of negotiations, Dvoretskaia, the producer of Show One Entertainment, a company that showcases high-profile musicians and artists,will be bringing Bashmet to Toronto's Roy Thomson Hall.

Bashmet, along with his musical group the Moscow Soloists, won a Grammy in 2008 for best small ensemble performance. Although he started his career determined to become a rock star, he is known as the performer who brought the viola into the limelight.

"He was not planning to be a classical music performer," Dvoretskaia said. "He always wanted to be a rock star, and he played rock guitar for the longest time."

Bashmet began playing classical music only as a favour to his mother. Although he started with the violin, he was once asked to try the viola, an instrument that many saw as inconsequential. He quickly proved them wrong.

"He's one of the very important musicians in the world," Dvoretskaia said. "He's a very serious household name in Russia."

Bashmet has a unique style. "He has long hair," Dvoretskaia said. "When he plays, he's very emotional. He moves his head a lot, his hair is all over. When he plays, he has tears sometimes." Just recently, it was reported that Bashmet was playing so fast, he broke his 250-year-old viola at a concert in Italy.

In Toronto, Bashmet will perform two solo pieces, Paganini's Concertino in A Minor and Bruch's Kol Nidrei, an old Jewish prayer that's sung on Yom Kippur.

When reviewing the list of possible songs, Dvoretskaia immediately knew Kol Nidrei was a significant choice.

"As soon as I saw Kol Nidrei, [I knew] that was something I wanted them to play," she said. "I'm Jewish myself. If there's any chance to somehow popularize Jewish tradition or Jewish music, I take that chance."

Growing up in St. Petersburg, Russia, Dvoretskaia often had to hide her religion.

"At a certain point, I didn't even know I was Jewish," she said. "That country was anti-Semitic at that time."

Dvoretskaia believes music is a way to encourage understanding. "I strongly believe that music has no borders," she said. "It's my obligation to promote and present Jewish music to non-Jews, because I can."

Dvoretskaia hopes the concert will encourage Torontonians to embrace classical music.

"A lot of people I know never listened to classical music before," she said. "It can awaken something that sleeps deep inside."

Bashmet will perform at Roy Thomson Hall on Feb. 17 at 8 p.m. Tickets are $45 to $90. Call 416-872-4255.

Collection of essays is a real guilt trip

By SIDURA LUDWIG
Special to the CJN

Hey, have you heard this one?

Q: How many Jewish mothers does it take to screw in a lightbulb?

A: None. I'll just sit in the dark.

Guilt is as much a part of Jewish culture as chicken soup and matzah balls. And the varieties are endless: guilt for being too religious, or not religious enough; for enjoying a bacon double cheeseburger, or for skipping shul; for calling your mother once a day, or only once a month. What would we complain about with our friends over countless cups of coffee were it not for the guilt?

Editor Ruth Andrew Ellenson explores this question in her fascinating anthology of essays The Modern Jewish Girl's Guide to Guilt (Dutton, 2005), a National Jewish Book Award winner.

Twenty-eight Jewish women writers of the modern day are gathered together in this collection like a roundtable discussion. Each takes her stab at Jewish guilt. The result is a diverse collection of personal essays covering a wide variety of topics: loyalty to Israel, having (or not having) children, marrying out of the faith, divorcing the perfect Jewish man, finding the perfect Jewish man, and (maybe most importantly) saying no to guilt.

More than just a study of Jewish women's guilt, the essays in this collection go beyond the cover topic and explore the Jewish woman's struggle for identity today.

As Ellenson writes in her introduction, "For Jewish women today, there is a fundamental struggle: where do we end and where do our people begin?"

There is Gina Nahai's piece, Mercy, which reflects on the lives of Jewish women in Iran and what it means to have escaped that oppression as a woman now living in freedom in Los Angeles.

Rebecca Walker's essay, Expecting, follows Walker's journey in naming her newborn son – whether to honour her Jewish heritage or her chosen Buddhist faith.

In What Will They Think? Tova Mirvis chooses to be true to herself and not cover her hair as an Orthodox, married woman. She writes: "I felt as if the purpose was not to cover my hair, but to cover myself. When I ripped my hat off my head, the second I walked into my apartment, I felt like I could be myself again. Once I was walking down Broadway and caught a glimpse of myself in a mirror. A voice whispered out from underneath the hat: this is not who you are."

'This is not who you are'

While many of the women work through their guilt to discover who they really are, their mothers take a bit of a beating. As the joke implies, the voice of guilt in this collection is often the mother (and sometimes the father). In You Sit in the Dark, I'm Coming Out of the Closet, Kera Bolonik holds off exposing herself as a lesbian out of concern for how her mother's friends will respond.

My Private Caller is a humorous look at Lori Gottlieb's call display, which she uses to screen her mother's calls.

In Being Fruitful, Binnie Kirshenbaum chooses not to have children, much to her mother's dismay. She writes: "'I loved being a mother,' my mother said. Perhaps, but given that she flew to work the minute my brother and I were old enough to fend for ourselves, maybe my mother didn't love being a mother quite as much as she protested. I did not doubt that my mother loved us, but loving your children is not the same thing as loving motherhood."

What impresses most about this collection is the honesty, which at times is gut wrenching. Jenna Kalinsky offers an intimate portrayal of her marriage to a German man in the essay, Great, My Daughter Is Marrying a Nazi. She writes openly about the loneliness she felt moving to Germany, their struggle to bring their two cultures together, and then the ultimate difficult decision to split.

THE MODERN JEWISH GIRL'S GUIDE TO GUILT
"Strong and moving stories about what it means—culturally, spiritually, and emotionally—to be a Jewish woman in today's world."
—Los Angeles Times

Likewise, Cynthia Kaplan's American Express offers a painstaking and touching look at a granddaughter's love for her ailing grandmother and the guilt she and her family feel in deciding to place her in a nursing home.

And then there is Big Mouth: Jewish Women and Appetite, in which Wendy Shanker rants with such passion about why so many Jewish women are not only big in size, but in personality and spirit. This essay will have you cheering by the end.

Not all the essays are as successful. Dara Horn's The Last American Nerd is a lovely look at the relationship between teacher, student and the love of academic life, but never really seemed to fit the guilt topic. Also Tell Me About Your Mother, by Molly Jong-Fast, followed the author's relationship with a number of therapists, but does not take the reader anywhere deep.

(As an aside, I was curious as to why so many of the writers in this collection seemed to live – or have lived – in New York City, and as a runner-up, Los Angeles. Do Jewish women outside of the American Northeast not experience guilt? Do Jewish women writers not exist in places like Chicago, Denver or St. Louis? As much variety as there was in essay topics, the tone of the essays began to feel the same when the stories were taking place on either the Upper East Side or the Upper West Side.)

This book is very much a collection of current Jewish angst. Reading it was like sitting around a kitchen table with a group of girlfriends, each taking her turn to unload. The title is apt in reflecting on the sum of the contents inside: this collection is indeed a guide to understanding the modern Jewish woman, her identity crisis and why she carries around so much guilt.

Sidura Ludwig is a writer living in Thornhill. Her first novel, Holding My Breath, was published by Key Porter Books in 2007. She is working on her next novel, and has never lived in New York City.

Young actor just wants to keep on acting

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Rachel Marcus, 11, has a lot in common with Booky, the role she plays in Booky's Crush, produced by Platt Productions and Shaftesbury Films and premiering on CBC TV, Feb. 15 at 8 p.m.

"I'm determined to get what I want, and I love to solve other people's problems. I'm always trying to figure things out," Rachel said in a recent telephone interview.

Booky's Crush is the third instalment in a series of made-for-TV movies based on books set in Depression era 1930s Toronto – That Scatterbrained Booky, With Love from Booky, and As Ever Booky – by Bernice Thurman Hunter, a former department store clerk who wrote her first book in 1981 when she was already a grandmother.

Rachel also played Booky – her first professional job as a result of her first audition about 1-1/2 years ago – in the second instalment of the movie series, Booky and the Secret Santa, for which she received a Gemini nomination.

A competitive dancer who has won awards in musical theatre, Rachel, a Grade 6 public school student in Thornhill, has also appeared in a number of school plays.

"I decided I wanted to act professionally after I met Daniel Magder [17], who played in the TV series Life With Derek. I asked him how he got into acting, and he told me to try out for an agent. I did that, and she gave me a script to memorize. Then I got the Booky role.

"I don't feel like I am Booky, but I do know her very well.

Rachel Marcus

If she wanted to act, she would try, just like I did. I had a lot of fun during the filming. I never got nervous, because I have lots of experience on stage with my dancing."

In her new role, Booky and her friends are just discovering boys, and she is quite interested in a new boy that she has been chosen to tutor. "My mother in the movie [Megan Follows] is very smart, and she helps me out a lot. We had lots of money worries, but we always managed."

Acting and dancing keep her quite busy, Rachel said, "but I always have time for my friends. They're very important to me, and I would not give them up for anything. I think Booky would be like that, too."

As for her future plans, Rachel said she wants to finish school – her favourite subjects are art and drama – and she wants to play Booky in a third movie. "I want to act for the rest of my life, and I'm looking forward to acting on stage."
